This is a cultural intifadah, an all-out war, not against "the occupation" or the "Gaza operation," but against Israel itself. Just as Palestinian suicide bombers undermined their own propaganda yelling about "the settlements" by attacking Tel Aviv and Haifa, treating all of Israel as a "settlement," these boycott bullies find everything or anyone Israeli repulsive, no matter where they stand politically. This blacklist approach treats potential allies as enemies, dooming any chance for peace. It's hard to be open to compromise and reconciliation when your existence is threatened, when the very essence of who you are seems to trigger disgust in others.

Fortunately, the most unlikely of celebrities demonstrated how to fight this hatred. After she joined in condemning TIFF, Jane Fonda had second thoughts. Responding to a letter against the boycott signed by Jerry Seinfeld, Sacha Baron Cohen and others, Fonda realized that this proposed boycott against the Jewish state would harm the peace process and was like the despicable Hollywood blacklist of the 1950s.

People in the pro-Israel community take note: comparing the boycott to the blacklist was a masterstroke. It showed that the best way to fight these affronts is to master the insider language of the community in question and demonstrate – what is often true – that the attack on Israel is an attack on core liberal values, in this case, freedom of expression and association.

Joining Fonda in resisting the hate was Cohen. He showed that the good people of the world cannot be cowed. Cohen ended his concert by raising his hands solemnly, reaching back into his personal and communal tradition as a Kohen, a priest, and reciting the priestly benediction.

Wouldn't it have been grand, to have thousands of Israelis and Palestinians together absorbing that blessing, with its moving final lines, "May the Lord lift up his face to you and grant you peace."

Now, when you deprive yourself of these and other cultural opportunities, preferring to perpetuate hatred instead, we must ask, "Who is the loser?" – in both its meanings.

Things you can see from there

Israeli pop star Yehudit Ravitz sings: "Dvarim sheroyim misham, lo royim mikan" – "things you see from there, you don't see from here." How right she is.

From there, I see an interfaith iftar, a breaking of the Ramadan fast, with more than 100 Jewish and Muslim students eating and studying together texts on repentance from both the Torah and the Qur'an. From here, I see deep antagonism between Jewish and Muslim students at our universities.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein in Jerusalem

From there, I see a rally of 20,000 Israelis speaking out after a tragic murder at a Tel Aviv lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered youth centre. From here, I see Queers Against Israeli Apartheid politicizing and polarizing Toronto's gay Pride Parade.

From there, I see women's groups denouncing "honour killings" – murders by men (let's call them what they are) of female family members they suspect of doing something, or more likely having something done to them. From here, I read "feminist" author Naomi Wolf claim that the burqa – a full veiling of a woman with only a slit to see out of – as a kind of new "feminist" statement.

From there, I see Israeli film festivals showcasing sensitive and soul-searching films about national identity, ethnicity, the Palestinian-Israeli conflict. From here, I get an orchestrated protest at the Toronto International Film Festival.

From there, I see honest, hard-working folks on both sides; beggars on both sides; dishonest politicians on both sides; schoolchildren being taught to hate on both sides; people trying to make ends meet on both sides, and youth groups trying to bridge the gaps on both sides. I see women in headscarves from both sides giggling at the freedom of learning to drive a car. I see fear and misunderstanding on both sides, and anger, loss, pain, stubbornness and closed-mindedness on both sides.

What I see there is extremely layered. It's not the lazy caricature of slogans that emanate from the mouths of those confined to ideology – on both sides.

What I saw at TIFF was a calculated attempt to divide Jews from Jews on the subject of Israel – to divide Jews who support Israel, even with critique and discomfort, from Jews who don't support it at all, as if to say, "Oh, I'm Jewish too, but I'm oh-so-much-more-moral than those Jews, I'm not like those Jews, those non-thinking zealots who blindly sing Hatikvah and therefore obviously feel no pain at the suffering of others."

It was an attempt to separate Jews who work for a two-state solution from Jews who would have Israel be anything but a Jewish state, to separate Jews who critique out of love from Jews who critique out of anger – so that those of us who ever call Israel to account are reticent to do so now for fear of being associated with the "anti-apartheid" crowd. Progressive Jews are powerfully silenced into toeing the "party line" for fear of being misidentified with a vocal group of left-wing, Jewish anti-Zionists.

Today's new morality police – people who condemn without ever once questioning how they can support freedom for everyone except Jews in Israel, who trivialize the pain and suffering of a people that has never wanted anything more than peace in a small corner of the world, in their ancestral homeland – are confined to a version of morality that totally disregards those of us who seek real change.

We must not let our tikkun olam get hijacked. We must not fear being thrown together with strange bedfellows and therefore stop working for the kind of just peace that we know is possible. We must not let the Jewish "anti-Israeli apartheid" left stand in the way of our hope, our longing, our vision, our commitment to dialogue and our proactive work for peace.

We must not be intimidated into believing that the evil is so large and so one-sided and so onerously ours alone.

"Dvarim sheroyim misham, lo royim mikan" – "things you see from there, you don't see from here." We must see clearly the things from there that can be reflected here.

The Kirshner File

A unique institution in Poland

The Emanuel Ringelblum Jewish Historical Institute is unique. "It's the most important Jewish academic-level institution in Poland," said its director, Eleonora Bergman, in an interview.

Known as the Jewish Historical Institute until 2008, it is the largest depository of Jewish archival documents, books, newspapers and Judaica in this country, and is funded by the Polish ministry of culture.

Sheldon Kirshner in Warsaw

Located at 3/5 Tlomackie St., in the centre of Warsaw, the institution is housed in a building that once served as the library of the Great Synagogue, an ornate 19th-century Reform shul blown up by the Nazis on May 16, 1943, shortly after the destruction of the Warsaw Ghetto. The Germans also torched the library, and the scorch marks from that fire have been deliberately left on the marble floors of the foyer as a testament to Nazi brutality.

The library was rebuilt in 1947, renovated in 1993 and substantially modernized between 1997 and 2000 with funds from, among other sources, the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany and the Foundation for Polish-German Cooperation.

The institute's most precious holding is the Ringelblum archive, which consists of 1,680 documents, diaries, papers and posters related to life in the doomed Warsaw Ghetto, the Nazi occupation of Warsaw from September 1939 to February 1943, and the Nazis' genocidal plans to exterminate the 3.3 million Jews of Poland.

Eleonora Bergman

According to Bergman, an architectural historian born in Lodz and the director of the institute since 2007, the archive is an invaluable source for historians studying the Holocaust in Poland.

It was collected by Ringelblum – a historian, teacher and social activist – and his colleagues after they formed the Oneg Shabbat organization, whose goal was to preserve the institutional memory of the ghetto. Its founders met secretly in the library.

Shortly before Ringelblum and his family were smuggled out of the ghetto, on the eve of the Jewish uprising on April 19, 1943, he arranged for the archive of approximately 25,000 pages to be placed into several milk cans and metal boxes and buried.

When the Germans found the Ringelblums on the "Aryan" side of Warsaw on March 7, 1944, they executed them and the Polish Catholics who had hidden them.

In September 1946, 10 of the metal boxes were discovered beneath the ruins of the ghetto. A little more than four years later, two of the milk cans were found in a cellar.

"It was thought that a third milk can was buried on the grounds of the present-day Chinese Embassy," said Bergman. "A search was undertaken, but nothing turned up."

The archive, which is off-limits to almost all visitors, is stored in nine vaults in a temperature-controlled basement of the institute. Three volumes culled from the archive have already been published.

The Emanuel Ringelblum Jewish Historical Institute

The institution is also in possession of a plethora of other valuable items – a mountain of documents from prewar Jewish communities in Poland dating back to the 18th century, 7,300 Holocaust survivors' testimonies, including witness accounts of the 1941 massacres of Jews by Poles in the towns of Jedwabne and Radzilow; a card catalogue of more than 3,000 Jewish prisoners-of-war in Lublin killed in the Majdanek concentration camp; the complete set of Gazeta Zydowska, a Jewish newspaper licensed by the German authorities from 1940 to 1942; the collection of the Central Committee of Jews in Poland from 1944 to 1950; the correspondence of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee from 1939 to 1942, and 40,000 photographs.

The library, the only one of its kind in Poland specializing exclusively in Jewish topics, has a collection of some 80,000 books, half of which are in Yiddish and Hebrew.

The Germans, having removed the original collection of 35,000 volumes late in 1939, transported it to Berlin, said Bergman. "We don't know what happened to it."

But in 1947, a cache of books, manuscripts, old prints and ceremonial worship items, including textiles and Book of Esther scrolls, were found in Lower Silesia.

The institute's museum contains more than 11,000 objects, from paintings and sculptures to handicrafts and ritual textiles. The oldest paintings, displayed in a permanent exhibition, are by Mauricy Gottlieb, Samuel Hirszenberg, Jakub Weinles and Leopold Pilichowski, all 19th-century artists.

The second permanent exhibition chronicles the Warsaw Ghetto and consists of photographs, documents and films, including a half-hour movie in Polish, English, Hebrew, German, French, Russian and Spanish.

Within the bowels of the institute is the Jewish Genealogy Learning Center, which was launched in 1994 by the Ronald S. Lauder Foundation and is mainly supported today by the Taube Foundation for Jewish Life and Culture.

Its American director, Yale Reisner, has been working here for the past 15 years.

At the beginning, he said in an interview, he spent much of his time helping foreign visitors of Polish Jewish extraction document their roots. "It was family heritage work."

Lately, many inquiries have come from Polish Catholics who have either learned of their partial Jewish ancestry or suspect it.

Inquiries also come from several additional categories of people, said Reisner.

"After the war, some Holocaust survivors decided to close the Jewish chapter in their lives. They thought it was better to lie low and maintain a false identity." Of late, their children have talked with Reisner.

As well, he has been approached by Jews raised by Catholics, hidden in monasteries during the war or born into diehard Communist families of Jewish origin. He told a story about a Polish army general who, having buried his Jewish roots, wanted information about his late parents. In addition, Reisner receives inquiries from the children of mixed marriages whose parents were wed before or after the war. "People fell in love, or rebelled, and married out of the faith."

Some of these couples were Jewish converts to Christianity who were forced into the Warsaw Ghetto, where they attended churches – All Saints, St. Mary's Carmelite and St. Augustine – whose presiding priests were of Jewish origin.

Yale Reisner

Reisner also hears from Poles who have taken an interest in Jewish culture or have visited Israel. "They wonder whether there is something inside them pushing them in that direction."

Reisner, too, gets calls from people, primarily foreigners, who believe that their ancestors left property behind in Poland. "That's a whole legal morass we don't get into."

Since Poland joined the European Union in 2004, he has received inquiries from Jews in Israel and the Diaspora who want to capitalize on their parents' or grandparents' Polish nationality so as to be eligible for Polish citizenship and passports.

The information he extracts on their behalf derives from a variety of archives: municipal, state, military and police records, homeowner lists, tax rolls, memorial books, phone books and business directories.

"The hardest records to obtain are from Warsaw, since 84 per cent of it was destroyed during the war."

Reisner does not charge for his time, but the Lauder Foundation usually asks for donations after services have been rendered.

The data he unearths can have significant effects. "Some people have joined Jewish organizations or gone on Birthright trips to Israel. Survivors have found their rescuers. One woman, an orphan, found her mother in Denmark and her two brothers in Canada."

Reform movement gears up for biennial

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Union for Reform Judaism (URJ) – the umbrella for more than 900 Reform congregations in the United States and Canada – will hold its upcoming biennial at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre from Nov. 4 to 8.

Approximately 2,500 delegates are expected to attend the event, which is held every second year and has not taken place in Toronto since 1979.

Rabbi Michael Dolgin, senior rabbi of Temple Sinai Congregation of Toronto – one of 26 Canadian congregations in the Canadian Council of Reform Judaism – said the biennial is "one of the centres" of the Reform movement's continued strength.

"Having it here in Toronto is an opportunity not only for the Reform congregations, but the entire community, to be enriched by the energy of this spectacular program," Rabbi Dolgin added.

Along with some high-profile speakers, the biennial website lists more than two dozen Jewish entertainers including Craig Taubman and Canadian talent like Mark Weinstock and Jaffa Road.

Speakers include Tony Blair, former prime minister of the United Kingdom; Dr. Ruth Westheimer, who will discuss "Sex in the Jewish Tradition" at a Shabbat luncheon; Miriam Ziv and Michael Oren, Israel's ambassadors to Canada and the United States respectively; Anita Diamant, author of The Red Tent; Jerry Silverman, new president of United Jewish Communities and former head of the Foundation for Jewish Camping; and Eboo Patel, founder of the Interfaith Youth Corps. King Abdullah of Jordan will speak via a video feed.

Torah scholar Aviva Zornberg, philanthropist and Jewish camping advocate Harold Grinspoon, and MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler will also speak at the conference, and will receive awards from the URJ.

URJ president Rabbi Eric Yoffie will deliver the major address at Shabbat morning services.

Among topics being addressed at the biennial's learning sessions are creating a culture that invites and supports conversion; special-needs camping; welcoming gays into the synagogue; the impact of day schools on the Reform movement; keeping singles and divorced members involved; and a look at Reform Jewish dietary practice.

Preconvention programs include a symposium on Jewish identity and development from Nov. 2 to 4.

New CJPAC head seeks more members

'I want to create conversations and build up trust with the community'

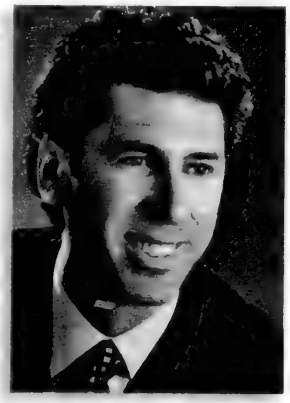
By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The new executive director of the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC) wants to see more of the community.

In an interview last month, Mark Waldman, who recently took over as executive director at CJPAC – replacing Josh Cooper – told The CJN that he hopes more Canadian Jews get involved in politics, and quickly.

With the country seemingly on the verge of an election every month, Waldman, 41, said the committee is ready to mobilize the Jewish community to become active in the event one is triggered.

"Hopefully, there won't be an election for awhile," he said. "We'd like some time to broaden our [5,000-strong] membership base in the country."



Mark Waldman

Waldman, a native Torontonian, was a founding member of CJPAC and said he's returned now because the timing was right for him personally. He said he's always had a "passion" for the community "and this is something I helped start."

CJPAC defines itself as "a unique national, grassroots, independent organization whose mandate is to engage the community in the political process."

It's a membership-based, non-partisan national organization dedicated to getting out the Jewish voice across all party lines.

Since its birth in 2004 – then known as CIJA-PAC (Canadian Council for Israel & Jewish Advocacy-Public Affairs Committee) – it has amassed 5,000 members and implemented numerous programs aimed at getting Jewish youth more active in and aware of politics.

For Waldman, taking over from Cooper – who he's been friends with since childhood – is akin to being passed a figurative baton.

"I've had a lot of experience advocating for the Jewish community," he said, though that's a bit of an understatement.

His past and present affiliations include: Access Middle East and United Way; serving as co-chair of the UJA Major Gifts Campaign; member of the UJC Young Leadership Cabinet; founder and co-chair of the UJA Jewish Venture Philanthropy Fund; co-chair of the Friends of Simon Weisenthal Centre's first annual campaign, and working as a Big Brother for JF&CS in his 20s.

Most recently, he served on the board of the Canada-Israel committee.

His CIC biography states Waldman has also been "involved in broader political causes such as Canada-US relations, where he co-founded 'Friends of America' to counter anti-American sentiment in Canada."

Waldman is also a director of the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Marnlen Management, his family's business.

He said all the contacts he's made over the years should serve him well in his new position with CJPAC.

"I'd love us to work with more Jewish organizations... it's in our best interests."

But his main focus right now is to bring in as many members as possible, with the goal of opening more offices across the nation to better represent the community.

"We're looking to open an office in Vancouver and expand programming," he said. "I'll be doing a lot of travelling in the country. It's my job to communicate our importance to the Jewish community. I'd love to have people on the ground in every city, but it's not possible right now."

He said he'll be using one of his other passions, using social media and online marketing tools, as a means to achieve these goals.

"I want to create conversations and build up trust with the community," he said. "Relationships matter... and I'll soon be launching a campaign to reach out to higher-net-worth donors and younger volunteers. I'd like to double CJPAC's membership to increase our funding and create more engagement."

For those sitting on the fence about whether to get more politically involved, Waldman says it doesn't take much to make your voice heard.

"Just by doing a bit... you can make a difference," he said. "We're here to help make it easier. We've had tremendous success these last five years. The community can't always see it, but it's there."

Still, he said he encourages anyone interested in learning more about the organization to "reach out" to CJPAC via its online presence.

"'Fan' us on Facebook. Join our organization. We'd love you to talk to us."

From Bernie Madoff to Montreal's Earl Jones, news stories abound of "financial advisors" who offered trusting clients the promise of safe investments with a high, consistent return, only to be revealed later as fraudsters operating elaborate Ponzi schemes that ultimately left many investors penniless.

Trust alone is not enough. That's why it's so important to have an understanding of what you are investing in. How safe is the investment? How transparent is the process? Can you lose money? Is there any potential for fraud?

When you invest in the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund, you'll find the answers you need. Answers that will satisfy whatever concerns you may have.

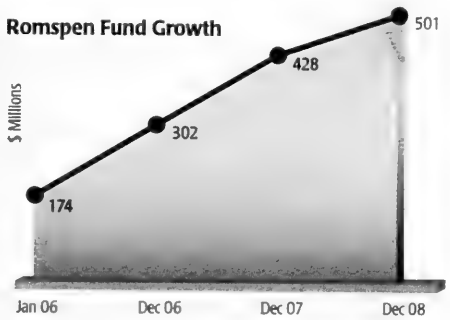
Here's why.

The Romspen Fund is invested exclusively in short-term mortgages on Canadian commercial real estate (96% are first mortgages). Each mortgage loan is considerably less than the value of the property as originally appraised.

More importantly, however, is the fact that the investment process is entirely transparent. Each and every one of the Fund's 115 mortgages is registered on title to the property that secures the loan in a government regulated registry system. Each provincial registry is accessible to the public allowing anyone to verify any investment the Romspen Fund makes. Every mortgage is also posted on our website for investors to view.

For additional reassurance, investors should know that the Fund has been audited since inception by KPMG, the fourth largest accounting firm in North America.

As more and more frauds are exposed, investors are seeking the peace of mind that comes with knowing their investment in the Romspen Fund is secured, offers an attractive monthly return, and cannot be part of a fraudulent scheme. Last month alone, this confidence resulted in the purchase of more than $16 million of additional Fund units by 100 new and existing investors.



Many of our investors are financial experts. Many more are not. What they have in common is a willingness to take a little time to understand how their money is invested. Come to this month's seminar and learn more about the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund. It's a very simple and smart thing to do.

Mia Farrow to headline Ve'ahavta event

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

When actor and humanitarian Mia Farrow comes to Toronto next month as the keynote speaker for Ve'ahavta's Tikun Olam Awards Ceremony, she'll convey to her audience that "with knowledge comes responsibility, and none of us get off the hook."

On Nov. 8, Ve'ahavta's annual Starry Nights event in Toronto will feature an address by Farrow, who has starred in more than 40 films, including Rosemary's Baby and Hannah and Her Sisters, and has been a high-profile advocate for children's rights as a UNICEF Goodwill Ambassador. Ve'ahavta will also recognize honorees such as Skylink CEO and humanitarian Walter Arbib and television producer and philanthropist David Shore.

Mia Farrow

In an interview with The CJN, Farrow said it wasn't until she was asked to speak at the event that she learned about Ve'ahavta, the Toronto-based, non-profit Jewish humanitarian organization.

"Its commitment to justice, assisting the needy, both locally and abroad – I just thought, 'That is exactly what I'm all about,'" Farrow said.

She said that as she understands it, Ve'ahavta is founded on the understanding that the world we live in is a beautiful place, but with that comes responsibilities.

"We enjoy all of these things, but if we're in a position to alleviate suffering, then we need to step up. I like their core message, and it's one that I try to pass on to my own children."

She said she often tells her 14 children that "with knowledge comes responsibility" and that we're all "part of a larger human family.

"Most people turn away rather than intervene and help… I adopted 10 children and gave birth to four children, and I thought that that was my contribution. I hope it's one of them."

Farrow said that she couldn't pinpoint the moment or event that triggered her commitment to humanitarian work, but said she was deeply affected by the 1994 Rwandan genocide.

"I think all of us can only feel like abysmal failures when we think of Rwanda and all the ways our countries, our best institutions, our churches, all failed the people of Rwanda. I feel a very personal sense of failure. I didn't know, but I don't think that's an excuse," she said.

"The press failed also. What were we doing during the Rwandan genocide that was so important that nobody noticed while a million people were hacked to death? I Googled that time, and people were watching the O.J. Simpson trial and reading about that."

She said that when she first learned about the situation in Darfur in 2004, about the genocide, "it was one of those jaw-dropping moments when I thought, 'This time I can't claim that I didn't know.'"

Farrow said that it was in 2004 when she made her first of 11 trips to the Darfur region of Sudan, where a conflict over land between African farmers and Arabic nomads began in 2003 and escalated into a violent war between African guerrilla groups and the Janjaweed. This war led to the murder of hundreds of thousands and the displacement of three million people in refugee camps, some of whom are dying from hunger and disease.

It was on the plane ride home that she realized "it was incumbent" on her to do her utmost to bring an end to the suffering she had witnessed.

"I hope that doesn't sound presumptuous, because I didn't presume for one minute that I could end what I had seen, but that I needed to do my utmost as a human being. I needed to step up in all the ways that were available to me."

She said she has since given countless interviews to talk about what she had seen, she's written opinion pieces about the situation, she's taken photographs and started a website (www.miafarrow.org) where she posts photographs and updates for all to use as a resource.

"I used to think that if people know, they'll surely do something, but now I think it's way worse than that, that people don't care," Farrow said.

"Elie Wiesel put it best… 'The victims of the Holocaust perished, not only because of the killers, but also because of the apathy of the bystanders. What astonished us, after the torment, after the tempest, was not that so many killers killed so many victims, but that so few cared about us at all.'"

Farrow, who has travelled to other "places of extreme misery," including the Congo and the Central African Republic, said her job is to be a messenger.

"I can tell you what I've seen and I can show pictures… with the hope that a person will be galvanized to do their utmost."

Farrow said she doesn't allow herself to become discouraged by the apathy of others.

Fashionistas create trendy frum outfits

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

The worlds of fashion and religion rarely intersect, but that's going to change if Natasha Budovitch and Francesca Abony have anything to do with it.

The two women launched Tznius-ista, a lifestyle and fashion-event planning service, at Aish in the Annex last month with an event that was part fashion show, part shopping spree.

Tznius-ista is based on the idea that dressing modestly should be fun. "Being tznius is not just about what you're wearing, it's about how you act and how you carry yourself," Budovitch said.

"We want to show girls that you can be yourself and be beautiful without baring it all, and we also want them to have fun in the process."

As well as holding fashion shows and events, Tznius-ista will run seminars and workshops on how to shop, style and wear modest clothing.

A recent graduate of Ryerson University's fashion communications program, Budovitch had been working in the fashion industry for the past few years, but it was only recently, through Aish HaTorah, that she became more observant. After reconnecting with Judaism on a Birthright trip to Israel, Budovitch became increasingly involved in Aish and began to realize the difficulties of dressing modestly.

"I am growing spiritually and adapting the concepts which have put me in a position of not just seeing the other girls of the [Aish in the Annex] house struggle in finding proper clothing but putting myself in the situation as well," she said.

Natasha Budovitch

"I find myself going into stores I would never otherwise go into and trying to convince myself to buy something I don't even like because it follows the rules I don't want any women, young or old, to feel that way."

So, she envisioned Tzniusista, a brand that would serve up fun, trendy clothing for women who like to leave a bit to the imagination.

To help turn the idea to reality, Budovitch enlisted fellow fashion-enthusiast Francesca Abony. Instantly connecting on the idea after meeting on Facebook, the two went straight to work on planning the launch event.

"We want to help broaden people's minds and open their closets," Abony said. "Dressing with certain restrictions can actually be very empowering."

The two asked several local designers to create looks that were not only frum, but fierce for the Tzniusista event.

Francesca Abony

"For me, it should be about women and fashion... the designers really understood that," Abony said.

Perhaps an indicator of Tzniusista's broad appeal, the all-day event was attended by women in skirts and shorts alike.

"Everything looks so beautiful, I don't feel like I'm looking at 'restricted' clothing at all," said Jackie Adler, a Tzniusista shopper.

"I found out about this on Craigslist, and once I started talking to the girls, I knew that this was something I wanted to be part of," said Evelynne Kuzniak, a hair accessory designer.

Womenswear designer Angela Marret said: "I work with Hachnosas Kallah [which helps poor brides and grooms pay for their weddings], and I understand the need for tznius clothing, so I created some hip and beautiful skirts just for the event."

Other local designers featured were Guru, Laura Nardone, Janet Caterina, Channy Chang and Cara Houpt.

Rebbetzin Chana Goldstein hosted the event, which was supported by Aish in the Annex. "My husband [Rabbi Mitch Goldstein] and I are in the business of inspiring people, and I am incredibly inspired by these two girls," she said.

"There is a mitzvah that says you should walk modestly for your God, but there is another one that says you should dress like a princess, with your head held high – Tzniusista encapsulates those two ideas perfectly."

Budovitch and Abony have plans for an online boutique and an expanded consultation service.

Ruth Wisse, Martin Peretz Professor of Yiddish Literature and Professor of Comparative Literature, Harvard University

Few have thought as long and hard about the relationship between Jews and power, especially in the contemporary context, as has Professor Ruth Wisse. In this major lecture, she will reflect on the Jews' relationship to Israel, the Obama initiatives in the Middle East and what it means — or does not — to "repair the world."

The opposite of love is indifference, says Wiesel

Wiesel, who called his survival of the Shoah "an accident," said that indifference is not an option, just as racism is not.

"I have said that the opposite of love is not hate, it's indifference, and that is true. The opposite of knowledge is not ignorance, it is indifference. The opposite of beauty is not ugliness but indifference," he said.

"What we must see in each other, in the street, in the passerby, is not an enemy but a fellow soldier. Not an enemy, but a friend, a companion."

"Remember that life is sacred, and, therefore, life cannot be replaced. Functions can be replaced, but not life," he said.

"Whatever you do in life, whatever endeavour you undertake in life... remember these few words: always think higher and feel deeper... Let not your goal be at the expense of another person's despair."

During a press conference, Craig Kielburger, one of the youngest-ever members of the Order of Canada, said that simple actions can make a significant positive change.

"Whether it's a young person going door to door asking for non-perishable food or coming to an event like this to hear about a message of social change and be inspired and bring it back to their school ... [that] is our message," he said.

"People respond to that message because they are really searching to bring about positive change in this world."

Kielburger also said the public school system should work to incorporate social action philosophies into the curriculum.

"We need to shift our education process ... [it shouldn't] just [focus on] reading and writing and arithmetic, but we also need to focus on the 'three Cs' – compassion, raising young people to care about the world; courage, giving them the means to stand up for what they believe in; and community, we need to show them that they are not alone."

The Kielburgers also promoted a new campaign called "10 by 10." The goal is to raise money and donate volunteer hours to fully develop 10 communities in Third World countries by providing education, health care, clean water and sustainable income.

Adam Seelig's play Talking Masks, which fuses the Greek tragedy of Oedipus with the ancient Hebrew tale of Isaac and Ishmael, is the inspiration behind Ancient Text, New Art, the presentation hosted by Koffler Arts Salon on Oct. 25. And Amos Oz's novel Panther in the Basement is the basis of the Israeli film Little Traitor, being screened on Oct. 31.

Besides the cooking demonstrations by author Aviva Allen and celebrity chef Howard Dubrovsky on Oct. 25 – admission is $30 for each – the theme of food seems pervasive at the fair. A preview event at Caplansky's Deli (at 356 College St.) on Oct. 22 features David Sax, author of Save the Deli, a book about the glorious past, diminished present and questionable future of the delicatessen. From Couscous to Kasha is the title of a memoir by Jewish communal worker Dr. Seymour Epstein that actually has little to do with food.

Noah Alper, who sold his bagel company for $100 million or so about a decade ago, is scheduled to discuss his book, Business Mensch: Timeless Wisdom for Today's Entrepreneur. And Karen Fisman, author of the Chanukah story An Adventure in Latkaland, is making several presentations during which children may make puppets.

Those with a hunger for more literary fare may feast on presentations by the likes of David G. Roskies, author of the award-winning memoir Yiddishlands (Oct. 25); Lily Poritz Miller, author of the novel In a Pale Blue Light about a Jewish family in South Africa (Oct. 26); and authors Lauren Kirshner (Where We Have To Go), Cary Fagan (Valentine's Fall), Sidura Ludwig (Holding My Breath) and Adam Sol (Jeremiah, Ohio) who are participating in a New Jewish Fiction and Poetry session on Nov. 1.

Two intriguing new Canadian memoirs are being spotlighted on Oct. 28. Marc Stevens, author of Escape, Evasion and Revenge, shares his father's story as a German-Jewish RAF pilot who later moved to Canada and never revealed his Jewish heritage. And Fred Kaufman, author of Searching For Justice, discusses his roots in a Jewish family in Vienna and being interned as an "enemy alien" in Canada before becoming a lawyer and judge.

On Oct. 29, author Michael Wex discusses his new book How to Be a Mentsh (Not a Shmuck) and acclaimed American scholar Dr. Lawrence Schiffman discusses his new book about his specialty, the Dead Sea Scrolls. On Oct. 30, Rabbi Erwin Schild discusses his memoir, And Miles to Go Before I Sleep. Six Walks With a Day of Rest. Author Nava Semel is the focus of two events (Oct. 26 and 27), revolving around her Holocaust-themed book And the Rat Laughed, which has been made into an opera.

Also included in the book fair are a workshop in writing memoirs and family stories, a book review of Nancy Huston's Fault Lines by Cathy Tile, a session on The Zen of Jewish Knitting by Rosanne Bernard, a session on Whispers from the Camps by Kathy Kacer and Sharon McKay, and a children's presentation by Kathy Clark, author of Guardian Angel House.

Some events are free, some require paid tickets. No longer in the Leah Posluns Theatre (which closed in June), the book fair is being held in the newly built and renovated Lipa Green Conference Centre. "We're in a new venue – and it's gorgeous," said Helen Redner.

For admissions and schedule, visit www.kofflerarts.org.

Actress Marlee Matlin headlines UJA Campaign event

By Daniel Horowitz

Despite losing her hearing at the tender age of 18 months, giving up was simply never an option for Academy Award-winning actress Marlee Matlin.

"All I can say is that I was born a Matlin," the 44-year-old told the audience at a Jewish community dinner in Chicago. "As a young girl growing up in Morton Grove, Illinois (just north of Chicago), I was fortunate that I was born into a family that never took no for an answer: that never let deafness stand in their way. For them it was about a lot of intention and a little chutzpah."

Matlin, who at 21, was the youngest recipient of a Best Actress Oscar for her motion picture debut in Children of a Lesser God, will be the featured speaker at a unique United Jewish Appeal Campaign event on Wednesday, October 28 at 7:30 p.m. at Toronto's Events On the Park (1095 Leslie Street).

This exceptional event – to mark the midway point of UJA's 2010 Campaign – is open to all community members who commit to making a gift to the campaign. Matlin will speak about her incredible story of courage, perseverance and Jewish identity.

The event will also feature live entertainment and a dessert reception.

Matlin, the third child born to Don and Libby, became deaf due to a bout of Roseola Infantum. That didn't stop her, though, from acting in a children's theatre company at age 7, playing Dorothy in The Wizard of Oz.

Marlee Matlin

She went on to study Criminal Justice at Harper College in Palatine, Illinois, and maintained her passion for acting after graduating. While performing on stage throughout Chicago and the Midwest, Matlin attracted notice for her performance in a production of the Tony award-winning play Children of a Lesser God, and was cast in the movie version alongside William Hurt.

Matlin has already appeared in numerous films, but it is her television roles that have most increased awareness of her in the hearing world. She has appeared on many shows including, E.R.; Reasonable Doubts; Picket Fences and The West Wing. She has also guest-starred on numerous shows including NBC's Sweet Justice with Cicely Tyson; Showtime's anthology series The Outer Limits; The Larry Sanders Show and Spin City. She received her third Emmy Award nomination for her work on The Practice.

"Despite dire predictions that I would never work in Hollywood again, today, I am still a working actress," she said. "And, though it hasn't been easy, I have refused to back down, just as my parents refused to back down. Each day, I do my best to remind me that there are many, many thousands out there with different abilities who deserve no less than I deserve – to dream and follow their hearts."

Marlee is also a spokeswoman for the National Captioning Institute. In 1995 she testified at a Congressional hearing, and helped get a law passed that requires all television sets 13 inches or larger to be manufactured with built in chips to provide "Closed Captioning" on their screens.

- Tickets purchased by October 20 are $20 ($25 after that date).
- To register for this event, please call 416.631.5700 or visit ujaevents.com/registration/marlee

The Prosserman JCC's Fitness and Health Centre on Sherman Campus opened its doors on October 5 to a group of enthusiastic, fitness-minded folk.

Featuring high-tech, interactive workout machines, the centre is an ultra-modern facility which is already proving to be a popular place to not only improve members' health but their social networking, too.

"I had coffee with a couple of the women I met on opening day; and that's a great way to spend some time cooling down after a great workout," said Doris Starr. "This is going to be a very popular place."

The contemporary Goldie Fitness Centre features state-of-the-art workout machines including cardiovascular equipment with entertainment systems and virtual cycling with 'Expresso' bikes. Also part of the Prosserman JCC Fitness and Health Centre is a member's lounge and three group exercise studios, including a 'spin' studio created specifically for cycle classes.

Many of the workout machines are among the most innovative in the fitness world, and are being featured in Toronto for the first time.

"The dual-action cross training machine is amazing," said enthusiastic new member Felice Blatt. "I have never seen anything like it before. It will actually cut my workout time in half because of how many different muscles it targets. It's my new dream machine."

Tonya Faganely, General Manager of the Prosserman JCC Fitness and Health Centre, is thrilled about the variety the new gym offers.

"There are between 45 to 55 different classes being offered throughout the week, including yoga, pilates, spinning, conditioning and Group Power©. There really are activities for every stage of life and every level of fitness. You tell us about your goals and we'll create a plan that suits you."

"The staff is super-eager to please," said member Cindy Granek. "Whenever you have a question or concern they are right there to help out in any way they can."

As with any new venture, there are always kinks that need to be worked out in the early stages.

"We are now creating a 'top ten changes list' to support our members," said Bryan Keshen, executive director of the Prosserman JCC. "Some will happen in days, some in weeks and some within months. We will provide those to members so that we share both the issues raised and the alternative solutions."

Membership to the Prosserman JCC's Fitness and Health Centre is available for ages 12 and up, with special packages for seniors, full-time students and youth. For more information call 416.638.1881 x4105 or email fitness@prossermanjcc.com.

Kohen marker scientist to discuss Jewish genetics

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Particularly in the Jewish community, Karl Skorecki, director of medical and research development at Rambam Health Care Campus in Haifa, is known for his groundbreaking studies on kohanim, indicating a common male ancestor among most modern-day Jewish priests.

As well, he is known for the work of his research team showing that some 3.5 million – 40 per cent – of Ashkenazi Jews are descended from four women who lived in Europe 1,000 years ago.

Skorecki, a professor at the Technion - Israel Institute of Technology, will discuss "The Genetics of Being Jewish" at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation on Oct. 28 in an event co-sponsored by Canadian Friends of Rambam Hospital and the synagogue's continuing education committee and brotherhood.

He will also meet with hospital supporters in Montreal.

In a way, the Toronto talk brings him back to his roots. A native of the city who grew up around the corner from Beth David, he was gold medalist of his medical school class at the University of Toronto in 1977.

Karl Skorecki

A Harvard University-trained nephrologist with expertise in molecular genetics, Skorecki was the director of nephrology in the department of medicine and pediatrics at the University of Toronto when he left in 1995 to join Rambam and the Technion, with which the hospital is affiliated.

He is currently involved in several endeavours, including stem cell-related cancer research and the genetics of kidney disease. Personalized cancer therapy, still in the research stages, is one of his projects.

Recently there has been "a paradigm shift in trying to understand the management of cancer," Skorecki said in a telephone interview from his home north of Haifa.

"A lot of people think about eradicating cancer, [but] it may not always be possible to eradicate it completely."

However, like AIDS, he said, cancer may become "a disease that one can live with for many years, and we are working on that."

Skorecki, now a 56-year-old father of five and grandfather of 12, decided he wanted to pursue a career in medicine when he was still a teenager at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. "A physician has a great opportunity to… make a contribution to tikkun olam."

A son of Holocaust survivors, Skorecki whose 40-page CV lists many professional honours and awards – didn't imagine when he embarked on his career that part of it would be linked so closely with the Jewish community.

From a medical standpoint, his work has particular implications for the Ashkenazi Jewish community, as well as other populations he has studied, including the Druze.

Like Ashkenazi Jews, the Druze have "a lot of" genetically based diseases, he noted. But unlike Ashkenazi Jews – a larger, more geographically spread-out group descended from a small number of ancestors – the Druze community is smaller and more localized geographically, with "many different [long-ago] paternal lineages" and, at the same time, more recent in-marriage among relatives.

What that means, Skorecki explained, is that Ashkenazi Jews worldwide share the same predispositions to genetic diseases, while genetic diseases among the Druze are village-specific.

There is also good news, he added, noting that genetic predispositions exist not only for disease but also for protection from certain diseases.

Skorecki's initial kohen study in 1997 triggered studies of Jewish Diaspora communities around the world, from Spain and Portugal to Kaifeng, China, and from India to Africa, he said. "This work is all continuing quite intensively."

It started in a Toronto synagogue, when Skorecki, himself a kohen, wondered whether the kohen of Sephardi heritage who had just been called to the Torah shared a common ancestry with him. Kohen status is passed from father to son, and the modern-day Jewish priests are believed to be descended from Aaron, the biblical high priest.

The study identified a predominant DNA sequence marker indicating the likelihood of a common male ancestor who lived about 3,200 years ago, coinciding with the time of Aaron.

Recently, Skorecki took on another new project when he became involved in the DNA Shoah Project in an advisory capacity. The project, in which his involvement is limited, uses DNA in an attempt to reunite families and identify potential remains in certain cases.

Outreach occurring at lay leadership level

Gissin said that from his perspective, the leadership of the Jewish community is beginning to understand this new paradigm. He cited two recent "significant examples" of this: one was the joint rally with the Indian community after the "murderous attack" on the Chabad House in Mumbai. The second is what he called "the impressive" Human Rights Advisory Council being created by B'nai Brith International, which includes representatives from numerous communities.

"So the understanding is there, the change of priority is there, but there is still a long way to go," Gissin said.

But so far, this outreach is primarily occurring at the lay leadership level, he said.

For Gissin, the process of fully engaging other communities won't be complete until similar dialogue occurs on a grassroots level, specifically between student groups on university campuses.

This is "the real arena where cross-cultural initiatives should be pursued," he said.

"I'm happy to say, that, at least within the framework of Toronto... there is a clear understanding that that's the next step. This is an area that has been neglected and more is going to be done," Gissin said, adding that there is one "clear" way to prevent Jews and Israel-supporters from being harassed on campus: get more people in your corner.

"When someone is trying to single us out on campus and in other arenas, they do it because it's effective. The way to change that, is to make friends. But you don't make friends through ad hoc projects. It's a long term process," he said.

Gissin believes Jewish students can make these friends and express their pro-Israel sentiments by socializing with their non-Jewish peers on topics of mutual interest.

"It's not necessarily about Hillel meeting a Muslim student club at York University or at Concordia University, for example. There are other student clubs that deal with the environment, politics, Canadian issues... those are the places where you can reach out and focus on common interests that bring Canadian society together. And that's exactly the area that Israel has a lot to offer in how it has helped Canadians, and those are the places to look for friends."

"I refuse to indulge myself in that way. I think our worst enemy here is our own tendency to feel helpless, and the saddest thing of all is the person who did nothing because they felt they could only do a little, or the person who didn't even try because they felt it was pointless."

"I don't allow myself to feel overwhelmed, because [Darfur refugees] demonstrate such courage, and if they can maintain hope, who am I to be overwhelmed or to allow myself to feel helpless and walk away?"

In 2008, Farrow was selected by Time magazine as one of the year's most influential people. She said that while she was honoured and humbled, she's had a hard time wrapping her head around that idea.

"If I really was one of the most influential people in the world, there would be a few more changes around here," she said with a laugh.

"I'm not seeing those changes."

Scholarship helps students with learning disabilities

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Edie Kalb finds comfort in knowing she's helping youngsters with learning disabilities through the Lev Chaim Foundation educational grant established in memory of her son, Brian. The scholarships were awarded this year for the first time.

Brian, who had a learning disability himself, died in his sleep two years ago at age 32 of atrial fibrillation, a heart arrhythmia.

His parents – Edie and her husband, Jack – and their daughter, Lisa Parshan, who lives in Detroit, were struck by the outpouring of affection after Brian's death.

Seven hundred people attended his funeral, and for a year, flowers arrived at his parents' home every Friday from his friends. A former schoolmate recalled on a Facebook memorial site that Brian stood up to bullies who were tormenting the younger child. He threatened them verbally, and they never returned.

Brian Kalb

Brian "was really a selfless guy," Edie said in an interview, recalling the time Brian saved someone's life by performing the Heimlich manoeuvre. He also brought at least one friend back to religion, she said.

"My son was a very humble person. He made friends with everybody. He was honest, warm, unaffected, and deeply religious. He had this magical personality that drew people in."

Initially, the family decided to memorialize Brian by donating a Torah to Congregation Kahal Yereim, the small shul he attended.

But family and friends not only raised enough money for the Torah, they exceeded their target, leading them to consider what to do with the extra funds.

A committee – including Kahal Yereim's Rabbi Shlomo Bixenspanner and two special education teachers – decided that two scholarships of up to $1,600 each would be provided to two children – a boy and a girl – with learning disabilities, who were attending Orthodox Jewish day schools in the GTA.

There is currently enough money in the foundation to fund the scholarships for about seven more years, Kalb said.

The goal was to use the money to help the recipients succeed, by helping pay for things such as remedial services or socialization opportunities, she added. "One family needed a computer. That is so easy to fix."

People with learning disabilities can "go as far as anyone else," said Edie. "You just need to find different paths."

This year, the foundation received 18 applications. The committee split the girls' scholarship among two recipients, one at Tiferes Bais Yaakov and one at Bnos Bais Yaakov, and one boy, a student at Yeshiva Yesodei Hatorah. The Kalbs requested that the students' names not be published, to respect their privacy.

Brian was one of the first students at the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School, which served children with learning disabilities and was closed in 2008.

Brian left the school at 15 and attended public high school and then yeshiva, eventually deciding he wanted to live an observant lifestyle.

Although the Kalb home had always been kosher, it was only after Brian decided to become observant that his parents changed their lifestyle also. His sister, Lisa Parshan, who lives in Detroit, had already become more religious.

At the time of his death, Brian was working as a driver for a linen supply store. Because of his outgoing nature, he loved being able to meet so many people through his work, his mother said.

Prior to that, he studied food and beverage management, and also worked at a bank.

"Lev Chaim" means "Chaim's heart." The name recalls in part Brian's way of "living with a big heart," his mother said. The foundation is a registered charity.

Bob Marley: bringing Judaism to the people

By RABBI ARI SHERBILL
Special to The CJN

When one thinks of Bob Marley, the first thing that conjures up in the mind is probably not how Jewish his music is – and even his look – yet Marley and many Rastafarians express the message, soul and experience of Judaism.

Marley is known and respected not so much for his talent and music but for what he put into the music and what it represented to him. When his album Exodus was named the album of the century by Time magazine, Time said, "Every song is a classic, from the messages of love to the anthems of revolution. But more than that, the album is a political and cultural nexus."

More than mere entertainment, his music has a message and Marley lived it. In a release from the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame upon his being inducted, it was stated that "his lyrics mixed religious mysticism with calls for political uprising, and Marley delivered them in a passionate, declamatory voice."

What made Marley a legend was the soul, passion and vision that he infused into his music – that is what drew the people to him and his music, what made him an icon of idealism and wisdom. What people don't know, however, is that those are the roots and soul of Judaism and the Jewish experience.

"Emancipate yourselves from mental slavery, none but ourselves can free our minds" said Marley in the Redemption Song. This quote is based on the essential teaching of Judaism that says to immerse one's intellect in the study of wisdom: "Freedom cannot be experienced without being immersed in the study of Torah" is a quote from the oral teachings of the Kabbalah. For Judaism and the Kabbalah teach that wherever the mind is, the person is – and so freedom can only be found in she or he who has a mind filled with divine intellect and wisdom.

In fact, Marley's encouragement of the Rastafarian religious practice of cannabis use is based on the same premise. Rastafarians say that in order to experience the mind, one needs to use cannabis, and that it brings a person to enlightenment and awareness. That idea is a Jewish ideal (without the cannabis) to live a higher life, to free our minds, to feel our soul and the soul of God, which is achieved and experienced through meditation, being happy, loving the world, isolated soulful prayer, and deep study of the Torah.

Rebbe Nachman of Breslov said: "When a person intimately knows that all that happens in one's life is for the best, as everything that happens in ones life comes from God – this is an experience of the world to come."

In that lesson, Rebbe Nachman teaches that we live a life of duality: good days and bad days, people we like and people we don't, pain and pleasure, love and hate – but life is not intended to be lived in a duality. The "belief" in one God is horribly misunderstood – for in Judaism there is no such thing as belief, for belief is an idea. In Judaism we experience, we know, we live – we live the oneness of God that expands all boundaries and limitations of understanding. God is one means that there is only God. All that we do, know and experience is God – One and that is something to experience.

The pain of life, the bad days and the hatred that we experience all stem from a lack of experiencing the oneness of God, the all-encompassing reality of an intimate relationship with God. When a person works on this through meditation and studies of these works, and if he learns from true teachers, a person can live a redemptive, heavenly and expansive life of the "good days" in which all is good. This is the soul of Jewish experience and the inner yearning of every one of us. Marley just used different words.

Marley sang his soul for people to leave "Babylon" and yearns to return to "Zion." Babylon represents all things mundane, such as lacking soul, lacking intellect, being negative, hatred, racism, abuse, sadness, etc., and especially people and nations who do not seek spiritual enlightenment. Zion represents the redemption of all those lackings and exiles, all those stresses and evils to a life of good, peace, love, music and soul.

These have been the teachings of the Jewish people for eternity. The depth, mysticism, soul, music, yearning, striving, studying, praying and singing is the soul of Jewish experience, but we're in exile, in Babylon. But even worse is that we don't know it anymore. More Jewish people in North America would associate filmmaker Woody Allen with Judaism before Marley; would associate boring services and sermons with Judaism before a soulful concert, and would associate negative connotations and experiences before an uplifting, enlightening, incomparable and awesome experience when thinking of Judaism – because we are in exile.

Marley spread the message of Judaism through the medium of music, but his listeners did more than listen: they thought about his message, they chewed it over and rethought about their lives.

Writing about Marley's song One Love, Christopher Farley said: "One Love is, of course, a Jamaican reggae song. But most listeners don't see it as being part of any one region – it has been embraced around the globe as an anthem to the human spirit. The song's title has also become a greeting – people the world over will say 'hello' and 'goodbye' with the words "One Love." A few years ago, the BBC chose One Love as the song of the century."

The impact of Marley's music is not only universal, but even more so it was personal. The reason why his music, lyrics, energy, passion and vision had such an impact was because it was true, and truth hits the soul.

During my nine years of studying in Israel, one of the most powerful experiences for me was the realization of how the Jewish people today have not experienced what Judaism is and can be.

When in Israel, we studied around the clock – staying up until 3 a.m., waking up at 6 or 7 a.m., and going strong all day (some naps here and there!). The more one learns, the more one experiences the infinite amount of material, wisdom and knowledge there is available, and how finite we are. Davening was something that took hours and hours every day as we felt the power of praying to God, talking to God, yearning for a greater reality and loving and appreciating the life we live.

Let us all forget everything we have ever learned, thought or experienced in Judaism to make way for a richer, truer experience. Let us listen to our inner yearning for a spirited, spiritual, deep, meaningful, lively, soulful, mindful, expansive and I-let-my-Jewish-soul-rock-out-with-God experience of Judaism.

May all of our Holy Days be beyond our wildest dreams.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

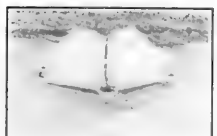
Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

The gift of Seth

By RABBI AARON FLANZRAICH

In this week's Torah reading, we hear of how the world and the universe were brought into being. We read about the shape of man and his partnership with woman. We read of man's sin against God and the expulsion of Adam and Eve from paradise. Their world was changed by their sin, but they were together with their family, ready to build a world that was less than perfect.



But then man sinned against man, and the world was never the same again. Cain's murder of Abel is the story of the world's first real crime. Our sages believed that Cain couldn't accept that by murdering his brother, he was sinning against him. As his brother lay bleeding on the ground before him, Cain looked at him, bewildered. He had no idea that this could happen.

Leave it to the mind of the great and prolific writer Elie Wiesel to imagine this horrible scene for us. He writes that we can only imagine Abel's last moments in this world, reaching out to his brother – one of the few humans he knew – for help and in confusion.

"Could my brother have actually done this?" and "What's happening to me?" were his likely thoughts. As his breath became shallow, as his mind became cloudy from the loss of blood, how could Abel not think the impossible was happening – "My own brother did this?"

And Cain, our murderer, what was he doing? Did he run off to hide? Did he stand there and cry? Or laugh? Or try to help? Or pray? Not knowing what else to do, he compounded the problem.

"Dmai acheecha tzoakeem aylai" – "The blood of your brother cries to me from the earth," God says.

In one of his biblical commentaries, Wiesel suggests that the Hebrew word "dmai" doesn't mean "blood" singular, but instead should be read as "bloods," plural. Cain didn't know where his brother's soul would leave the body, so the midrash says he stabbed him again and again, thinking that once the soul left, Abel would come back to life.

But he never did. He never does. Once the damage is done, it's done. And the soul never comes back. In the end, it was Cain who had a problem understanding God, but his brother paid the price

Yet for us, this story is not all doom and gloom. Like many of the stories in our tradition, this one also has a message of redemption and hope. As Adam and Eve hear the news of Abel's death, they are crushed by the knowledge that their other son was the murderer. But what do they do? They have another child, a boy. They name him "Shate," or Seth in English, a word that means to carry away and forgive. In this act of love, Adam and Eve end up giving us all hope. By having Seth, they "carry away" our guilt and sin.

As Wiesel notes, with this boy, they forever removed the scar of Cain's terrible crime from us. Because had they not had Seth, each and every one of us here would be descendants of their only remaining child – the murderer Cain.

So today we can look at each other and know that "I do not have to be from Cain, because I can be one of Seth's."

I don't have to choose violence and anger. I can choose the other way – the way of forgiveness and understanding.

God gives us a model for dialogue

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

The beauty of concluding all the holidays that start with Rosh Hashanah and conclude with Shmini Atzeret and Simchat Torah is that we're able to start reading Genesis again in shul. Each time we start reading the Torah from the beginning, it provides us with another opportunity to ask familiar questions about God and creation, and to search for more diverse answers. The questions may remain the same, but the choice of answers can indicate our growth.

While reading about the beginnings of the universe, the verse where God discusses the creation of humanity is always an anomaly. The Torah states that God says: "Let us create a human being in our image." Of course the obvious and recurring question remains: to whom is God speaking? And if we're able to surmise whom God is talking to, a second question remains: why would God need anyone else's opinion on the matter?

Rabbinic literature offers many possible explanations to these questions. On the one hand, a sage in the midrash suggests that God is speaking in what we today would call "the royal we." That is, the holiness of God necessitates using only the formality of language that would distance royalty from commoners. It's too personal to speak of God in the first person. And yet the very first word God utters to the Jewish people as a collective is the word "Anochi," "I am," a clear statement of the personal.

Another opinion in the midrash is that God is addressing the angels, who immediately construct quite valid arguments as to why creating a human being would be a terrible idea. The angels' arguments focus on issues that define the human condition and that would introduce discord into the created design. Reading this midrash is difficult, because the reader tends to side with the angels. Interestingly, while the angels are preoccupied with stating their case, God creates humanity and then ends the angels' arguments by proclaiming that it's a done deed.

The problem is that the question still remains. It seems common among the sages to accept that God is speaking with the angels, but why ask their opinion on anything, especially if in the end their opinion is ignored?

There's a beautiful midrash that introduces the idea of God modelling for creation how one should deal with decisions. There are always two options to problem-solving. One option is to unilaterally decide and dictate. The other option is to open the door of discourse and consult. This option doesn't mean you're handing the decision over to someone else, but rather inviting another voice to become part of the process.

God has consulted with beings who are lesser in stature and intelligence, the angels. It's a powerful model of true consultation in that it recognizes that every free-willed soul has an opinion to consider.

This one verse opens the door for all human beings to understand that as wise as we think we are, there's always another voice to hear and another perspective to consider.

Jewish Life

Jerusalem and the Patriarchs

By ALEX GROPPER

Past Forward

The Israel Antiquities Authority (IAA) recently announced the discovery of a massive wall at the City of David in Jerusalem.

It's an enormous structure reaching a height of eight metres that was part of the fortification system of Jerusalem in the Middle Bronze Age.

The Middle Bronze Age was a time of urban renewal in ancient Canaan. The end of the Early Bronze Age (circa 2200 BCE) saw a collapse of the urban culture that had arisen in the land shortly after 3000 BCE. Some have compared this period at the end of the third millennium BCE to the Dark Ages in Europe, after the fall of the Roman Empire in the West.

Sometime after 2000 BCE, urban civilization once more blossomed on Canaanite soil. There are a number of criteria that are necessary to have what is called a "civilization." They include writing, cities of 5,000 or more inhabitants, monumental ceremonial centres, social and political hierarchies, and craft specialization.

By 1750 BCE, a number of cities had sprung up in Canaan that had the characteristics required of a civilization. Many of these sites have been previously discussed in this column. Among them are the cities of Hazor, Lachish, Jericho and, yes, Jerusalem.

The Middle Bronze Age was the high point of Canaanite civilization. It was a civilization that stretched all the way from the Nile Delta up along the coast of the eastern Mediterranean and across Syria as far as the upper Euphrates.

The Mari Archives from the upper Euphrates that date from this period show a far-flung trading network at work. In one document, we see a shipment of tin going from Mari in Syria, to Hazor, in the upper Galilee.

Kathleen Kenyon, the eminent British archeologist who dug at Jericho in the 1950s and in Jerusalem in the early 1960s, (both of which were co-sponsored by the Royal Ontario Museum and its chief archeologist, A.D. Tushingham) believed that this entire region was part of common culture that she termed Amorite. It was discussed by her in the Schweich lectures given in 1963, which were published in 1966 under the title Amorites and Canaanites.

John Van Seters, a prominent Yale-educated scholar, and a Canadian, argued in his doctoral dissertation, which was published by Yale University Press in 1966 under the title of The Hyksos, that it was this enigmatic group whose culture both defined and dominated the region during this period. It was into this period of the Middle Bronze Age that William Foxwell Albright, the legendary American biblical scholar and archeologist, put the Patriarchs. His ideas dominated biblical scholarship in North America for more than 50 years, until they were undermined by a number of scholars in the 1970s. Among these scholars was Van Seters, who in his book Abraham in History and Tradition, published by Yale in 1975, argued that the patriarchal stories were to be dated at least a thousand years later.

The last few years have also seen a debate about the habitation of Jerusalem, a city that features prominently in a number of the patriarchal stories. Egyptian sources from the 19th and 14th centuries BCE are believed to make mention of the city.

The 19th century BCE belongs to the Middle Bronze Age. It was to this period that Kenyon dated a large stone wall that she found in the City of David in her excavations in the 1960s. Israeli archeologist Yigal Shiloh, digging in the late 1970s and early 1980s, uncovered more of Kenyon's monumental wall. The wall that was recently exposed in the IAA's latest excavations probably belongs to this building phase.

Although this discovery supports the evidence that Jerusalem was occupied in the Middle Bronze Age at the time Albright said Abraham was supposed to have visited the city, it does not prove Abraham's existence. That is a matter of faith, and faith by its very definition defies proof. It is a point for us to ponder at the beginning of another year.

Israel and organ donation

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

Differing interpretations about the role of organ donation in Halachah have meant that Israel has had one of the lowest organ donor rates in the western world.

Several years ago, Nancy Scheper-Hughes, a medical anthropologist and founder of Organs Watch, called Israel "something of a pariah in the transplant world. Without a strong culture of organ donation and under the pressure of angry transplant candidates, the Ministry of Health has refused to crack down on the country's multimillion dollar business in transplant tourism that arranges junkets from dialysis clinics in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv to medical centres in Europe and the United States." [bit.ly/jdon01]

A New York Times article from 2004 was also damning. "To meet Israeli's growing demand for organs, middlemen calling themselves brokers, from prominent doctors to a former spokesman for a health maintenance organization, have rushed into the market to set prices for a scarce product that can reach $150,000 for a kidney… 'As of today, there is no law in Israel that forbids trafficking in human organs,' Meir Broder, a legal adviser to the Health Ministry, explained in an interview in Jerusalem. 'There is no criminal aspect at all.'" [bit.ly/jdon02]

(These claims should not be confused with recent accusations by the Swedish tabloid Aftonbladet, that the Israel Defence Forces stole organs from dead Palestinians in the late 1980s and early 1990s. The charges were denounced by Israeli and Jewish groups as baseless and reminiscent of anti-Semitic blood libels. [bit.ly/jdon03])

Last year's death of Rabbi Yossi Raichik also put Israel's transplant system back into the headlines. Rabbi Raichik was a Chabad rabbi who helped thousands of Jewish children immigrate to Israel after the Chernobyl nuclear meltdown. He suffered from a prolonged lung illness and required a lung transplant. As his condition deteriorated, his hopes were pinned on a woman who had been declared brain dead following a stroke. A rabbi respected by the woman's family forbad the transplant. He said that Halachah requires that the heart must have stopped before transplantation could be allowed to ensure that the donor had died according to Jewish law. Unfortunately, once the donor heart stops beating, this operation can no longer be done. While other rabbis were being consulted about the permissibility of the procedure, both the woman and Rabbi Raichik died. [bit.ly/jdon04]

Last year, the Knesset passed two related laws about organ donation. The first defines the time of death and was formulated in consultation with different elements in the haredi world. As explained on Ynet.com, death is defined by several criteria including the "cessation of brain activity," the failure to breathe without need for life support, no response from the pupils and an absence of other reflexes.

The second law gives donors certain benefits in recognition of their efforts. These include not having to pay for medical services resulting from the donation, compensation from the state, a certificate of merit, and free entry to the country's nature reserves and national parks. As well, it gives a preference to people who sign the donor card should they be in need of an organ transplant in the future. The law also prohibits organ trafficking and receiving compensation for organs. [bit.ly/jdon06]

New laws don't mean old controversies have ended. "The day after the legislation passed," reported the Jewish Week, "MK Moshe Gafni from the ultra-Orthodox United Torah Judaism party, said the new law blatantly violates the Torah… Gafni said that 'from the Torah's point of view a brain-dead person is still alive.'" The Jewish Week then quoted Robby Berman, founder of the Halachic Organ Donor Society in New York, as being skeptical that the laws will have any significant impact on organ donation in Israel. "The bottleneck to donation is not the law but people's misunderstanding of the medical and halachic issues surrounding brain-stem death. The solution is education, not legislation." [bit.ly/jdon07]

Next week, education, Judaism and organ transplantation.

Manitoba, Hebrew U collaborate on medical research

Scientists to explore HIV/AIDS, influenza and swine flu

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The province of Manitoba has announced that it's committing $100,000 per year for the next three years toward collaborative research on HIV/AIDS, influenza and swine flu to be carried out by scientists in Manitoba and Jerusalem.

The research will take place under the rubric of the newly founded Global Research Exchange Program, a project initiated by Canadian Friends of Hebrew University (CFHU).

The province's commitment means that the Global Research Exchange Program's funding now totals $1.1 million, which includes money committed by the University of Manitoba and Hebrew U, as well as a $100,000 grant from the Winnipeg Foundation. It also includes $300,000 raised from the CFHU gala dinner in Winnipeg in May 2008 honouring Winnipeg researcher Dr. Frank Plummer. CFHU also received support from the International Centre for Infectious Diseases after its gala dinner.

Sheryl Rosenberg, president of the Winnipeg chapter of CFHU, said that the funding the project has attracted is a "fitting tribute to Dr. Plummer's dedication in the pursuit of vaccines to fight infectious diseases worldwide."

Plummer's scientific team at Canada's National Microbiology Laboratory and U of M will collaborate with Dr. Ofer Mandelboim's team at Hebrew U's Institute of Medical Research-Israel Canada. The fund will enable the scientists to travel between Winnipeg and Jerusalem to carry out their research.

Jim Rondeau, Manitoba's minister of science, technology, energy and mines, said the province was pleased to be supporting "such brilliant minds," through its Science and Technology International Collaboration Fund.

"We look forward to seeing the fruition of this great collaboration," he added.

Plummer said, "I never would have thought when I was honoured... at the gala dinner... it would have led to securing over a million dollars for research into infectious diseases."

Dr. Adrienne Meyers, who works with Plummer and is the senior research co-ordinator for the joint collaboration, visited with Mandelboim's team in Jerusalem this past summer.

"Dr. Mandelboim's team has expertise in a branch of immunology dealing with natural killer cells [NK cells], which defend against viruses and bacteria," she said. "The expertise of Dr Mandelboim's laboratory is a very good match with the expertise of Dr. Plummer's team, which has extensive experience with HIV/AIDS... The merging of the two teams makes a lot of sense scientifically, and will aid in filling important gaps in our knowledge base of how specific areas of the immune system function in the context of HIV infection."

Meyers said the two teams have already selected four specific projects, three of which deal with NK cells in the context of HIV, and the other project deals with NK cells in the context of influenza viruses, including swine flu.

The first project, already in progress, will deal with NK cells and host genetics. The second will examine how NK cells recognize the HIV virus. The third project will consider how NK cells interact with other components of the immune system in mediating resistance to HIV infection. The fourth project will research the role of NK cells during influenza infections, including swine flu.

"We want to see if NK cells help fight against the swine flu infection as they do against other viruses," Meyers said.

The Winnipeg Foundation and CFHU are now trying to generate further donations to secure ongoing funding for the research collaboration.

Ont. making changes to hate crime procedures

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

After meetings last week with members of Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada, Ontario Attorney General Chris Bentley changed the way hate crimes will be processed in the province.

According to B'nai Brith, the changes will now require that "decisions on whether to grant the attorney general's consent to the laying of hate crime charges will be made within 60 days of the request submission. All requests for charges under hate crime sections of the Criminal Code will also now be brought to the attorney general himself."

Len Rudner, Congress' regional director for Ontario, told The CJN that there's no set date for the changes to take effect.

"It's not certain when they will come into play. But clearly we have the assurance of the attorney general that they will be made," he said, adding that as far as he knows, at the moment there are no other cases involving potential charges under Section 319 of the Criminal Code that affect the Jewish community.

Bentley's discussions with Jewish groups was a follow-up to a July talk between the attorney general's office and Congress, after Bentley's office decided not to lay charges against University of Toronto student Salman Hossain for posting alleged anti-Semitic remarks online in 2008.

At the time, Congress had requested "further investigations" into the matter and asked for another meeting with the attorney general.

Hossain's postings targeted Jews and referred to Zionist conspiracy theories about the World Trade Center attacks.

In one, Hossain asked: "When do I get to shoot a few Jews down for attempting to blow up dozens of mosques in America right after 9-11… why f---ing target the Americans when the Jews are better?"

Hossain, a Bangladeshi-Canadian, added that he hoped for "many more merry 9-11s" and said "Jews are literally the most treacherous nation on the face of the Earth," and he claimed that "the filthy Jews carried out 9-11."

Congress wanted him charged under section 319 of the Criminal Code for wilful promotion of hatred.

In a statement last week, Congress' Ontario region co-chair Frank Bialystok said his organization believed Hossain's alleged statements "crossed the line into wilful promotion of hatred as defined by the Criminal Code. Yet we were told a number of circumstances, including the length of time it took to make a decision in the case and Hossain's own personal efforts for rehabilitation, were the reason the attorney general declined to give his consent and that no charges will now be laid."

Despite this, both Congress and B'nai Brith called last week's discussions with Bentley "positive" in that the province's new policy on hate crimes will allow these types of cases to be considered in an expedited manner.

Iranian refugee recounts harrowing escape

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Growing up Jewish in Iran was a "Garden of Eden" for Sima Goel. But that changed abruptly after the Islamic revolution of 1979.

"I was 15 when I was suddenly told what to wear, what to believe and who to like. My best friend was arrested for speaking out against injustice, and my aunt was abducted and executed," Goel told an audience of almost 800 women attending Choices, a major event of the women's campaign of Combined Jewish Appeal.

Goel, now a Montreal chiropractor, said that after the Ayatollah Khomeini seized power, her family feared leaving the house for months. "Acid would be thrown in your face if even a bit of your hair was showing," said Goel, a native of Shiraz in southwest Iran. They were so afraid that the family did not even attend her grandmother's shivah.

Her parents felt that they had no choice but to send their three eldest children, daughters aged 19, 18 and 16, out of the country, despite the risk.

Goel recalled Nov. 1, 1982 when she and her two sisters clandestinely made their way to the Pakistan border and were smuggled across it.

Sima Goel

All they had was the clothes they were wearing and enough money taped to their body to get by. "I remember my mother saying to us, 'Go, make something out of your life.'" Her parents had been reassured that it would be a 20-minute walk and then they would be taken by car to the border.

In reality, they walked for 20 hours through a mountainous region, where militants lurked. Goel believes "a higher power" kept them safe.

The girls would spend eight months in Pakistan, moving from city to city, until they arrived in the capital, Karachi.

They bought Turkish passports on the black market and finally, on June 19, 1983, landed at Montreal's Mirabel Airport where they claimed refugee status on the grounds of political persecution. They arrived without identification papers because they destroyed their Turkish passports.

The girls were detained for two weeks by Canadian immigration. Their first night of freedom was spent in a hostel, which cost $60, all the money they had left, she said.

They were advised to go to an organization in Montreal that helped political refugees. They had until now kept the fact they were Jewish secret.

When they did reveal their religion to a social worker, she immediately directed them to JIAS.

"When we had no family, JIAS was our family. They guided us to become responsible citizens and part of the community," she said.

DVD tells story of Jewish Hamilton

By HOLLY GINSLER
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Two friends have preserved the history of Hamilton's Jewish community with an oral history in DVD format about Jewish life in Steeltown from the 1930s to the 1960s.

The Jewish Hamilton Project was started five years ago and had its launch on Sept. 13 at the Shalom Village nursing home. It contains numerous interviews with Jewish Hamiltonians recounting their experiences and fond memories of growing up and living in the southern Ontario city.

The creators, producers and directors of the project are Billy Shaffir, a sociology professor at McMaster University, and Wendy Schneider, editor of the Hamilton Jewish News.

Schneider, who has an interest in Jewish family history, borrowed Shaffir's camcorder one day to record her own family's history and the idea for the Jewish Hamilton Project was born.

Shaffir came to Hamilton in the early 1970s from Montreal. He became a frequent visitor to his adopted home's Jewish community centre, where he heard many stories about what a wonderful place Hamilton had been and how the JCC had flourished.

"When I came here, [the Jewish community] was a shadow of its former self," he said. "People were talking about how Hamilton was a great place to grow up in."

The interactive DVD is divided thematically into sections about topics such as anti-Semitism, business and occupations, education, entertainment, "in the military," organizations, personalities, shuls, the JCC, and the war years. The entire DVD is approximately two hours long.

Both Shaffir and Schneider noted how people came alive as they reminisced about their city's past on camera.

Sam Hebscher recounts a story about the legendary clarinettist Benny Goodman and big-band leader, who was once playing a gig in Hamilton and attended a yahrzeit service at one of the synagogues afterward.

He gave a $20 bill to whomever was in charge after he finished his prayers, which caused great excitement, as this was a lot of money back in the 1940s.

Helen Yellin talks about one of the original synagogues on Canon Street. Her eyes light up with pride as she describes the beauty of the shul, which was built at the time by pedlars and poor people, and how it housed three magnificent chandeliers that she believes now hang in ritzy Toronto restaurants.

Cuppy Katz talks about Jerry's Men's Shop which open in 1916, on James Street North, where the family lived above the store. After three generations, it's still thriving.

Unfortunately, there could also be a dark side to living in Hamilton.

Moishe Waxman tells a story about a group of boys who pelted him with stones one day as he walked to his bar mitzvah class after school. The next day Waxman saw two of the boys. "I grabbed them by the back of their necks, banged their heads together and told them that if they ever threw another stone at me, they'd lose their arms. That was the end of that problem," Waxman said.

Shaffir and Schneider, who had to fundraise for the project, said the only way they were able to complete it was because of the many private donations they received.

They even received a couple of donations from Toronto, including from the Mirvish family. (David Mirvish's mother, Anne, was originally from Hamilton.) They also received funds from the B'nai Brith Sports Dinner, a large fundraiser held annually in Hamilton.

"This is a magnificent, beautiful product, and that is due to Dennis Haradyn, who did a masterful job at the art, the design, the DVD and the presentation," Schneider said.

She and Shaffir donated copies of the DVD to the JCC, as well as to each of the city's three synagogues and the Hamilton Hebrew Academy, among other Jewish gathering places.

The DVD is also on sale at Hamilton's Beth Jacob Synagogue and Shalom Village.

Shaffir said he hoped, however, that the DVD wouldn't be the last chronicle of Hamilton Jewry.

"Someone else will do more," he said. "There are always people that you should have spoken to, stories that other people want to tell."

International lawmakers sign declaration condemning Iran

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Liberal MP Irwin Cotler was one of the international lawmakers to sign a declaration last month condemning Iran's human rights abuses.

The inaugural declaration by the Trans-Atlantic Group on Counterterrorism (TAG) – formed in April 2008 and comprised of legislators from the United States, the European Union (including the Netherlands, Spain, United Kingdom, Austria, Romania and Cyprus) and Canada – called on the Iranian government to end human rights abuses of its citizens.

The declaration also called upon the United Nations to go to Iran to investigate alleged abuses, urged TAG members' respective governments and the UN to investigate alleged abuses by Iran's Basij militia, and said the UN Human Rights Council should freeze Iranian membership on the council pending investigation into Iranian human rights.

"This is historic because it is the first document signed by a group of international lawmakers addressing the Iranian regime's human rights record against the Iranian people," North Carolina Republican congresswoman Sue Myrick Myrick, who also co-chairs the U.S. bipartisan house caucus on counterterrorism, said in a statement issued following the declaration.

The signing took place inside the U.S. Congress in Washington shortly after TAG completed its second summit there and only a day before Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad addressed the UN General Assembly.

Speaking to reporters recently in his Mount Royal riding office, Cotler, the former justice minister and the Liberal party's special counsel on human rights and international justice said the two-day conference in Washington underscored the need to continue the battle against jihadism, or radical Islam.

"The interesting thing is that jihadism is a term used by Muslims among themselves," he said.

Cotler, the only Canadian in TAG, said the group's lawmakers will seek to have their governments act upon the declaration and work to reach Muslims where the belief in radical Islam often begins: in mosques, schools and the media.

Irwin Cotler

"It is a standing threat to their own communities," Cotler said.

While Cotler praised the fact that the Canadian delegation to the UN boycotted Ahmadinejad's address to the General Assembly, he also echoed comments made by Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff wondering why the Canadian government is taking no action to hold Iran to account.

On Sept. 23, Ignatieff "strongly urged" the Harper government to back Cotler's bill (the Iran Accountability Act) and his international petition.

Cotler was also the only Canadian speaker at a rally in New York the day after Ahmadinejad spoke at the UN.

Coast to Coast

A real double (bar) mitzvah

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A bar mitzvah by its very nature is a life cycle event linking generations of Jews, so a program initiated by Yad Vashem to "twin" bar mitzvah boys with boys who lost their lives in the Holocaust brought special meaning to a local family recently.

Mariana Herskovitz, mother of twin boys Eadan and Gedaliah Herskovitz Farber, had heard about the Yad Vashem twinning project and suggested to her sons that they may want to participate as part of the mitzvah they planned to do for their bar mitzvah.

"'Unto Every Person There is a Name' is a unique worldwide project. The idea behind this program is to honour and remember children who perished in the Holocaust before having the opportunity to be called to the Torah as a bar mitzvah. Remembering by naming the 'lost' child during the service restores the dignity of those children," the twins said in an e-mail to The CJN.

"First, Yad Vashem gave us the names of twin boys, but we were unable to find out more about them through any of their surviving family members. Our mother then suggested we honour my dad's half-brothers who were killed in the Holocaust. Our mom then found that they were registered at Yad Vashem. We were even more excited knowing that it would actually be our uncles that we would be remembering during our bar mitzvah."

During the Sept. 5 ceremony at Ottawa's Agudath Israel Congregation, Gedaliah explained what they were doing. "We are praising HaShem through our being called to the Torah as bnai mitzvah. We are honouring the memory of our fellow Jews, through the mitzvah of the Yad Vashem twinning program, in this case by honouring the memory of my father's half-brothers, David and Yitzhak, who perished at 11 and seven years old in the Holocaust."

The story of the boys' uncles – their father's half-brothers who died before he was born – was told by their uncle, Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress.

He and Stan, the boys' father, are the second family of their late father, Max, who lost his first family, including sons David and Yitzhak, in the Holocaust.

As "family chronicler," Bernie told the story of the brothers he never knew.

"There once were two young boys – David and Yitzhak. They lived in Botchki, one of the hundreds of small Polish villages scattered throughout eastern Europe in the 1930s, known in Yiddish as shtetls. Like other Jewish boys at that time, David and Yitzhak studied Talmud, played in forests, went on picnics, and walked to synagogue with their father on the Sabbath. While these boys and their family did not have much, theirs was a life imbued with faith, love and even hope. That was, until Sept. 2, 1939," Bernie said.

"That was the day the Nazis invaded Poland, and life was forever changed for the Jews of Europe."

Stan and Bernie's father lost his entire family. Eventually, he made his way to Canada where he remarried and started life anew.

Eadan and Gedaliah said they both felt that "our uncles were there with us during the service."

For their father, the experience was particularly poignant.

"My father passed away in 1990. There is no one left alive who knew my half-brothers or any of my father's first family that perished in the Holocaust. Nevertheless, the mitzvah of remembrance brought my remaining family and all congregants closer together during the service," Stan said.

"For me, it brought back memories of my growing up with my father having nightmares in the middle of the night with thoughts of what happened to his children, Yitzhak and David. To know that my children were able to remember them through this program was especially satisfying and perhaps, in some way, brought some closure to my father's pain as a survivor."

1921. In Eastern Europe, a million children are orphaned after six years of war and famine. 300,000 of them are left parentless by murderous anti Semitic attacks, their lives hanging by a thread. But South African businessman Isaac Ochberg dreams of saving these helpless souls. Filmed on location, together with archive footage & survivor testimony, Ochberg's Orphans reveals this unknown story of heroism. At at a time when war and genocide are all too common, Ochberg's story is a reminder of the difference one person can make.

In loving memory of our beloved daughter,

Stacey Louise Baer

(Jan. 18, 1971 – Oct 11, 2004)

In the 5 years since our beloved daughter Stacey's death, we have slowly learned to trust, to hope and to laugh again. Throughout our lives, we will feel the pain of our losses, the scars still present, even after much time has passed. Hopefully, we will find the strength to persevere in the face of pain. Stacey always had the power to dream, despite the hardship of illness. In her honour, we must push forward into an uncertain future without her. But all the while, with the determined spirit that was her everlasting gift to us

Forever in our hearts, with much love,

Mom, Dad and Jenn

Comic dropped from show

By JANICE ARNOLD

Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Irish comedian Tommy Tiernan's ironic anti-Semitic tirade last month has cost him a spot on the Just for Laughs (JFL) cross-Canada comedy tour that starts later this month.

JFL issued a statement last week that, "In light of recent events, JFL and Tommy Tiernan have decided collectively that Tiernan will no longer perform" on the tour, which is set to open Oct. 19 in St. John's, Nfld., stop in 20 cities, and wind up Nov. 15 in Kelowna, B.C.

Tiernan was scheduled to join the tour on Oct. 28 in Hamilton, Ont. His appearance had been announced in August.

"After speaking with him over the last week, we agreed that it was in the best interest of everyone involved that he withdraws from the 2009 tour," the statement reads.

The decision to drop Tiernan was made even though he insists his remarks have been repeated out of context and that he didn't intend to cause offence.

On Sept. 5 at the Electric Picnic Art and Music Festival in County Laois Ireland, Tiernan is on record as saying, "F—ing Christ-killing bastards. F—ing six million? I would have got 10 or 12 million out of that. No f—ing problem. Two at a time they would have gone. Hold hands, get in there, leave us your teeth and your glasses."

JFL public relations manager Meredith Sharpe said that Tiernan has told JFL that he "regrets" the comments "attracted so much controversy.

"According to Tiernan, he was parodying extremism and believes his remarks were taken out of context. He is very sorry for any hurt caused by this misinterpretation."

Tiernan, who has a frenetic, inconoclastic style, has been popular at the annual JFL festival in Montreal in recent years and had a sold-out one-man show last July. The 40-year-old comic has been known to make edgy jokes about religion, including Catholicism, and other sensitive subjects, but has never has been in hot water like this.

Dublin's Sunday Tribune newspaper reported that Tiernan made the remarks during an on-stage interview that touched on the boundaries of comedy. It later came to light that the question that prompted his rant, however, came from an audience member and concerned an actual criticism of his routine by a Jewish couple after a show in New York.

The incident provoked an uproar in Ireland that continues to dog Tiernan.

The Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, Diarmuid Martin, condemned his outburst, accusing Tiernan of trivializing the Holocaust, as did Irish Jewish parliamentarian Alan Shatter. The Holocaust Educational Trust of Ireland said it was "appalled" by Tiernan's "racist comments," while the Israeli ambassador to Ireland demanded an unequivocal apology.

On his website, Tiernan has posted a statement that his words have been "taken so far out of context that I am quite bewildered," but he admits that they now sound "callous, cruel and ignorant."

He said he is "greatly upset by the thought that these comments have caused hurt to others, as this was never my intention…"

"The things that I said in front of a live audience were an attempt to explain my belief that one of the duties of the comic performer is to be reckless and irresponsible and that the things that they say should NEVER be taken out of context."

He notes that his remarks were prefaced by saying that they should not be taken seriously.

Niall Stokes, the editor of Hot Press Magazine, the publication that interviewed Tiernan, has commented that to interpret Tiernan's remarks as anti-Semitic is "wrongheaded in the extreme.

"The way I see it, he is satirizing anti-Semitism, while making a more general point that we should all be able to laugh at ourselves."

PA textbooks deny Israel's right to exist

By BARBARA CROOK and ITAMAR MARCUS

Stephen Scheinberg is absolutely correct in saying that the issue of Palestinian hate education "demands an informed response" ("'They' are taught to hate," Sept. 17). How unfortunate, then, that his ramblings on the subject are anything but informed.

Had the professor done some original research on the issue instead of merely parroting false, ad hominem attacks by Akiva Eldar and Nathan Brown, he would have known that I (Itamar Marcus) am the founder of Palestinian Media Watch, not of the Center for Monitoring the Impact of Peace, and that our reports deal with the new textbooks published by the Palestinian Authority (PA), not with old Egyptian and Jordanian texts.

And he would have known that our latest report on PA schoolbooks, From Nationalist Battle to Religious Conflict, released in the U.S. Senate by Hillary Clinton in February 2007, is a 35-page, meticulously documented examination of the PA's new Grade 12 curriculum. It concludes that, like all other new PA schoolbooks released since 2000, these texts deny Israel's right to exist, anticipate its destruction and define the conflict with Israel as religious, not merely territorial.

Indeed, Clinton said at a Senate news conference that these textbooks "basically, profoundly poison the mind of these children," and that they are an "indoctrination," not an education.

Assuming that Scheinberg merely failed to do his homework and is not actually attempting to defend this kind of hate education, he will doubtless appreciate a truly "informed" look at what PA educators are teaching their Grade 12 students.

Guest Voice

Perhaps most disturbing is that the new curriculum shows that the ideological divide between Hamas and the supposedly moderate Fatah, publisher of these texts, appears to be disappearing. Hamas has always defined its war with Israel as religious and existential, which is what all Palestinian children will now learn in school:

"Ribat for Allah is one of the actions related to jihad for Allah, and it means being found in areas where there is a struggle between Muslims and their enemies. The endurance of Palestine's people on their land these days… is one of the greatest of the Ribat." (Islamic Education, Grade 12)

"Palestine's war ended with a catastrophe that is unprecedented in history, when the Zionist gangs stole Palestine and expelled its people from their cities, their villages, their lands and their houses, and established the State of Israel." (Arabic Language, Analysis, Literature and Criticism, Grade 12)

The conflict will eventually end – not with peace, but with Israel's destruction, effected by Palestinians of all ages and abilities:

"Palestine will be liberated by its men, its women, its young and its elderly." (Arabic Language and the Science of Language, Grade 12)

These textbooks anticipate the future destruction of Israel by depicting a world in which Israel already does not exist. Israel is marked as "Palestine" on all maps, and the "Palestine" that erases Israel is defined as a dawla, the Arabic word for "state," not a geographical region.

This "state" is said to have water access to both the Mediterranean and the Red seas, a situation possible only in a world without Israel. (Physical Geography and Human Geography, Grade 12) Likewise, the size of "Palestine," the "state," is said to be more than 10,000 square kilometres, a situation possible only if Israel does not exist, since the West Bank and Gaza Strip together total only 6,220 square kilometres.

Because Israel has no legitimacy and must be fought and destroyed for Islam, violence and terror against Israel since its founding are justified and glorified as muqawama, resistance: "The tragedy of Palestine of 1948 and afterward the muqawama in which the inhabitants carried acts of most glorious heroism and sacrifice…" (Arabic Language, Analysis, Literature and Commentary, Grade 12)

Books for other grades teach Palestinian children to aspire to death as a higher value than life: "Your enemies seek life while you seek death… death is not bitter in the mouth of the believers." (Reading and Texts Part II, Grade 8)

The new PA schoolbooks present Israel as an illegitimate enemy to be hated, fought and destroyed. Even the most well-meaning student is left with no justification or religious option to accept Israel as a neighbour to live beside in peace.

Scheinberg uses a 2007 survey, purportedly showing that a large number of Israeli high school students "showed a deep contempt for Arabs," to conclude that the Israeli education system is just as bad as that of the PA. This misguided attempt at moral equivalence – trying to equate unacceptable behaviour by individual Israelis with the systematic indoctrination to hatred by PA political, religious and educational leaders – effectively shields PA hate promotion from criticism and enables its perpetuation.

Scheinberg aptly cites the song from Rodgers and Hammerstein's South Pacific: "You've got to be carefully taught" to hate. But ironically, his equivocation makes him a defender of those who poison young minds with the values of hate, violence and death worship. He, and those who bend over backwards to make excuses for Palestinian hate indoctrination, bear moral responsibility for the violence and death that these schoolbooks leave in their wake.

Threat level reduced at Associated

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The security threat at Associated Hebrew Schools' Posluns branch has been reduced, parents were told last week.

The school, located on Neptune Drive and serving students from nursery to Grade 5, received a threatening communication late last month. Parents were notified in a Sept. 23 e-mail from school president David Brown that the threat was related to an ongoing criminal investigation involving members of a family with two children at the school.

Last Friday, Arthur Landa, Associated's executive director, e-mailed parents to let them know that the students concerned are no longer registered at the school.

"Based on ongoing security assessments… we have been advised that the threat to the Posluns community has been reduced significantly," Landa wrote. "We are therefore confident in returning to our previous security protocol," including going back to one uniformed security guard on duty.

The school has been in regular contact with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's community security director and in turn with the Toronto Police Service, Landa wrote.

Toronto police have been investigating the threat.

By BARRY DOV WALFISH
Special to The CJN

With all the attention the Dead Sea Scrolls are getting at the Royal Ontario Museum these days, it may be an appropriate time to remind the Jewish community of the wonders that are with us every day, specifically the treasures that sit in their midst at the Thomas Fisher Rare Book Library. In pride of place is the Friedberg Collection.

Barry Walfish

In the late 1990s, Albert Friedberg and his wife, Nancy, donated an extraordinary collection of rare books and manuscripts to the Fisher Library, and while there was a fair bit of publicity about it at the time, this collection remains one of Toronto's best kept secrets.

Manuscripts are the preservers of the intellectual heritage of the Middle Ages, both Jewish and non-Jewish. Despite the ravages of time, and the extremely precarious position of the Jews in many medieval communities, some 80,000 Hebrew manuscripts have survived. The major Hebrew manuscript collections in the world are in Israel (at the National Library), Europe (at Oxford University, the British Library, the Vatican Library, Parma, Italy, and many other places), and the United States (at the Jewish Theological Seminary, Hebrew Union College, the Library of Congress, and Yeshiva University). Until the Friedbergs' donation, there were no significant collections in Canada, so they quite literally put us on the map in this regard. While the collection is small (about 40 manuscripts, 40 genizah fragments and about 240 printed books), it is of outstanding quality.

From the time of the Dead Sea Scrolls until the next literary witnesses to have survived, there is a gap of some 800 years, until the early 10th century. We are fortunate to have some of these early witnesses in our collection.

One of these is a 10th-century copy of Halachot Pesukot by Yehudai Gaon, an important early halachic compendium, in extraordinary condition. We also have a copy of a Pentateuch written in very large letters in several hands, the earliest sections of which date from the late 10th century. Of the other biblical manuscripts, the most significant is a complete Bible from Toledo, Spain, dated 1307, written by Joseph ibn Merwas, a scribe renowned for his calligraphic skills and scribal accuracy. The latter two items are part of the ROM's Dead Sea Scrolls exhibition.

The crowning jewel of the Friedberg collection is a manuscript of the Zohar, the major work of Jewish mysticism. Attributed by tradition to the tanna Simeon bar Yohai of the second century, modern scholarship has determined that it's the work of Moses de León and his circle from the late 13th century. Despite its pre-eminence, very few manuscripts of this work exist.

The Friedberg collection includes a copy of the Zohar that has been dated to the beginning of the 15th century and contains the majority of the text of this mystical masterpiece. There exist only two manuscripts earlier than this one, and both are fragmentary. This manuscript is the fullest extant and is indispensable for scholars editing this text and studying the history of its transmission.

But this is not all. An inscription on the first page of this text by a certain Nathan ben Judah Noah states that Elijah the Prophet instructed Amira to study it day and night. Amira is the epithet used to refer to Shabtai Zvi, the mystical messianic pretender of the 17th century. It goes on to say that Amira passed it on to his student Abraham Michael Cardoso, who, on his deathbed bequeathed it to the author of the colophon, the doctor Nathan Noah. This is certainly an extraordinary testimony, one that locates this volume at the centre of one of the most tempestuous periods of Jewish history and in the hands of one of Judaism's most controversial figures.

Also of great historical significance is a commemorative album presented to Moses Montefiore, the prominent Jewish leader and philanthropist, on his 100th birthday in 1884 by the Hovevei Zion societies of eastern Europe. It includes 1,560 signatures of rabbis and dignitaries of Jewish communities from all over eastern Europe, as well as Montefiore's signature. It's written on vellum and sumptuously decorated and hand bound by a binder in Warsaw, who added his own dedication in three languages.

The Hovevei Zion (Lovers of Zion) Society was a precursor to the Zionist movement, and many of its members later became prominent leaders within that movement. This album provides important historical data for the history of this organization, as well as for the makeup of the leadership of the major Jewish communities in eastern Europe. It still awaits its redeemer.

A few other highlights worth mentioning are an elegant copy of the Sefer Mordechai, the important Ashkenazi halachic compendium by the 13th-century's Rabbi Mordechai ben Hillel; a beautifully decorated copy of Sefer Mitzvot Gadol by Moses of Coucy; an equally attractive copy of Kitsur Mordechai, an abridged version of Sefer Mordechai by Samuel Schlettstadt, and a copy of Shibbolei Haleket, the important Italian halachic code by Zedekiah ben Abraham Anau (13th century), which seems to have been produced during the author's lifetime.

Also worthy of note are some Mishnah fragments that probably date from the 11th century and have Babylonian vocalization, which fell into disuse shortly thereafter, and a large section of Talmud Masechet Shabbat from the 11th century, which could very well have been saved from a fire. The Talmud, especially, suffered from the ravages of time, so every surviving fragment is precious. We also have a significant collection of late medieval Ashkenazi liturgical manuscripts, including one with some very playful illuminations.

Genizah fragments also make up part of the collection, which includes a small sample of some 35 items on a variety of topics. The entire Cairo Genizah is being digitized by a team of scholars supported by Friedberg, and the Toronto fragments are a small part of this important scholarly enterprise. These fragments have been preserved in beautiful sealed mylar encasings, themselves works of art.

Aside from the manuscripts, the collection also includes many important examples of early printed works, including close to 30 incunabula; an outstanding collection of Constantinople imprints, comprising close to three-quarters of the Hebrew books printed there before 1540; several early rabbinic Bibles; every early edition of Maimonides' Mishneh Torah; a significant collection of early printed Haggadot, and much more.

The entire collection has been catalogued and the records can be accessed through the University of Toronto Library's online catalogue (www.library.utoronto.ca).

While the Friedberg Collection is our most prized possession, there are other significant Judaica collections at the Fisher Library as well.

The Friedberg Collection is complemented by the Price Collection of Rabbinics, which has more than 3,000 volumes of printed works covering the entire gamut of rabbinic scholarship. This collection once belonged to Rabbi Abraham Price, a prominent leader of Toronto's Orthodox community in the mid-20th century, who was a scholar, bibliophile, halachic decisor and author of several important works on Jewish law. The collection includes works printed between the 15th and 20th centuries.

The Schneid Collection of Twentieth-Century Jewish Art contains material gathered by Otto Schneid, artist and art historian, in preparation for writing a monograph on this topic. The archive includes German and Hebrew versions of Schneid's monograph, copies of his other articles and books, Schneid's correspondence with artists, autobiographies of these artists, reproductions of the artwork of some 160 artists, art books and pre-World War II exhibition catalogues, as well as Schneid's correspondence with world leaders and important figures on questions pertaining to human survival.

The Druck Collection of Kibbutz and Secular Haggadot includes close to 400 kibbutz and secular Haggadot, as well as Passover-related ephemera, dating from the mid-1930s to the 1990s. Most of this material was produced in-house by various kibbutzim, youth movements and army units for use at seder celebrations. One of the largest of its kind in the world, this collection documents how various Zionist, socialist, and secular groups and movements created new liturgies to satisfy their own spiritual needs.

Finally, we recently acquired the archive of Toronto ethnomusicologist and folklorist Naomi Bell, which contains an extensive collection of Yiddish and Hebrew folksongs, including sheet music and recordings, all classified by theme. This is an important resource for anyone interested in Jewish folk music.

It's important to note that all of these collections (with the exception of the kibbutz Haggadot) were donated by members of Toronto's Jewish community.

Judaica collections such as those found in the Fisher Library are invaluable resources for teaching and research in Jewish studies. They complement and add depth to the extensive Judaica holdings in U of T's Robarts Library. The Toronto Jewish community should be proud that such a significant collection of Judaica and Hebraica exists in its midst. It's my hope that more members will make use of this collection and also help it grow by contributing to the library so that we can build on this excellent resource and make it even richer and stronger.

New scholarship for dual citizens

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A new scholarship fund for Canadian citizens with dual Israeli citizenship has been set up to assist students who are working toward a bachelor's degree in Israel.

The Association of Americans and Canadians in Israel (AACI) and United Israel Appeal of Canada (UIAC) are currently accepting submissions from students who could receive up to 3,000 shekels toward their tuition. New immigrants, those who made aliyah from Canada within the past five years, can receive an additional 1,500 shekels.

"This year is the first year that United Israel Appeal of Canada together with AACI are offering scholarships to Israeli students holding Canadian citizenship," said Adva Abramovich, UIAC's assistant director of resource development and marketing. "The goal is to support higher education."

Students must complete an application form, which can be obtained by e-mailing canada-scholarship@aaci.org.il. Deadline for submissions is Oct. 20.

Proof of Israeli and Canadian citizenship must be provided, as well as a letter of acceptance into a recognized Israeli university or college.

Applicants also must provide tuition fee statements, proof they've completed volunteer work, and they must have completed army service in the Israel Defence Forces or Sherut Leumi (national service), unless they've been exempted for legitimate reasons.

"A classical instance of army exemption are people who became Israeli citizens or made aliyah at an age that exempts them from army service," Abramovich said.

The new scholarship is part of Magbit Canada, a UIAC organization that offers several scholarships that provide educational opportunities throughout Israel.

Scholarships are mainly given to students who live in the poorer areas of Israel – particularly in the north and south – providing them with financial assistance to achieve "professional and financial stability."

Most of the scholarships require that recipients participate in volunteer work to strengthen their bond with the region and its community.

Magbit Canada's scholarships include the Rabinovitch Family Scholarship Fund, which was established in Montreal in 1996 to encourage students from Metulla to learn medicine, and the Eilat-Eilot scholarship funded by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto called the Morris P. Pulver Fund, which provides students and researchers in the Eilot-Eilot region with scholarships and research grants to strengthen academia in the region and attract young people to Israel's south.

Gluing together expertise to help save lives

LifeBond closes wounds and stops bleeding

By ABIGAIL KLEIN LEICHMAN
ISRAEL21C

A veteran and an immigrant Israeli combined their talents to help save victims of conflict with LifeBond — a sticky new sealant that closes wounds and stops bleeding.

Living in Haifa during the 2006 Israel-Hezbollah war, entrepreneurial biomedical engineers Ishay Attar and Orahn Preiss-Bloom were horrified by the rockets landing nearby and the television images of bleeding victims. It seemed to them that existing methods for "sealing" injuries were inadequate to cope with complex shrapnel wounds.

Market research confirmed their initial hunch says Attar, previously vice-president of Misgav Venture Accelerator. One year later, he and Preiss-Bloom launched LifeBond, an innovative sealant made of biocompatible substances that can close wounds.

"Surgical teams are actively seeking innovative wound-closure products with improved performance and ease-of-use to seal surgical staple lines and stop severe bleeding," Attar tells ISRAEL21c.

According to the company, the sealant incorporates an adhesive formulation that mimics late-stage blood coagulation. It forms a network similar to the fibrin network of blood clots but has demonstrated adhesive strength even greater than that of blood-derived fibrin sealants.

In American and Israeli clinical trials, the company's LifeSeal product has shown great promise in preventing life-threatening leakage from surgical connections between blood vessels and organs, Attar reports.

"We will apply for regulatory approval in the United States, Europe, and Israel next [illegible] ISRAEL21c.

LifeBond, which is supported by [illegible] were those in the medical arena, because [illegible] adds profound meaning to the excitement of building a company," says Attar, 36.

He met Preiss-Bloom, now 27, in a graduate business course at the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology in Haifa. The former New Yorker had research experience in surgical procedure biomechanics and tissue engineering, and recently had served in the Israel Defence Forces' Institute of Military Physiology.

Attar realized that their combined interests and skills could take them far.

He jokes that Preiss-Bloom, a Columbia University and Technion graduate, is the best acclimated new immigrant in the country's history. "Orahn has demonstrated that American college graduates can succeed in Israel at the highest level," he states.

Preiss-Bloom acknowledges that many of his talented Jewish university classmates assumed that a move to Israel would compromise one's professional potential.

His experience has proven others see "so far, I have been pleased to keep pace with the career progress of my peers in the U.S.," he says. "I like people to know it is possible to succeed in Israel. Though the employment situation here has [illegible] been tough, there is a well-developed infrastructure for entrepreneurship that rewards [illegible]."

Preiss-Bloom points out that [illegible] incorporation, management and [illegible] compared to Attar, experts in [illegible] environment business development [illegible] have produced patents [illegible] I am extremely gratified that LifeB[illegible]

"The medical device industry has matured here, devices are easier to develop [illegible] technology and are very appealing from a technology perspective," he adds.

As it seeks to fulfil its founding vision of helping victims of military conflict, LifeBond is also seeking grant funding to develop a revolutionary field wound dressing.

Montreal native prevails over devastating injury

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A bump in the road caused Montreal native Mimi Najman, a passenger on a motorcycle leisurely circling the block in Jerusalem's Rechavia district, to slip off, and it changed her life forever.

On Yom Ha'atzmaut, May 11, 2005, 20-year-old Najman, an exuberant, fit, flag football player on Israel's national team, had been a guest at a flag football party hosted by a friend.

One guest came with a motorcycle, and Najman and a friend said they would like to try riding on it, each taking turns holding onto the driver.

The first time around the block was uneventful. But Najman wanted to try it again, and this time, the bike hit a bump – or it "slipped" and she fell off, an accident that made her a quadriplegic.

"I was on my back, I couldn't move," Najman recalled in a recent telephone interview from Israel. "I remember having this feeling of adrenaline rushing, but I was pretty calm. I wasn't panicky. But there are a lot of things I don't remember."

Within a day, her frantic mother, longtime Federation CJA Agence Ometz staff member Ruth Najman, was on her way to Israel, where she would spend the next year at her daughter's side. She left behind in Montreal her husband, Steven Spodek, a former executive director of Hillel who now works at McGill University, to tend to their newly adopted baby.

Mimi had graduated from Herzliah High School and moved to Israel at age 16 to attend a girl's religious seminary in Jerusalem. At the time of the accident, she was a second-year student at Machon Tal Women's Institute of Engineering, a school that combines Judaic studies with high-tech degrees.

The devastating accident marked the beginning of a period of physical and emotional rehabilitation and recovery that continues to this day, almost 4-1/2 years later.

Najman, now 24, experienced depression and "weeks where I didn't want to speak to anyone," she said. "I couldn't think about it. As soon as I did, it sent me into a depressed state.

"Until about a year ago, I was not really back to myself. Thank God I am now, but it's been a long process."

Long indeed. For the first three months after the accident, Najman was at Jerusalem's Shaare Zedek Hospital, her head completely immobilized in a "halo." Following that came nine months of intensive physical and occupational therapy in the rehabilitation hospital in Tel HaShomer near Ramat Gan.

Friends rallied round, and still do, including her older sister Eliane, who also lives in Israel. Najman said her right arm is "much stronger" than her left, but from the chest down, "nothing." Because of the evening cold of Jerusalem and its effect on someone with a spinal cord injury, Najman moved to warmer Tel Aviv. She lives on her own in a modern apartment, but needs two caregivers working in tandem around the clock.

Najman also has a laptop computer she writes with and uses to communicate with friends and family, but it's been being able to compete in sports again, she said, that has truly revived her spirit. She spends many hours each week practising and competing at table tennis and wheelchair, or "quad," rugby.

"It makes my day," she said. "It keeps me in shape. I think that's what I was really missing."

The accident also had a profound effect on her religious outlook.

"I still believe in God," Najman said. "It wasn't that I was mad at God. It just kind of made me realize that before the accident, if my faith was really that strong, I would not just be going through the motions. I just kind of slowly stopped doing things.

"I think I'm in a much better place now," she said. "I'm much happier."

For Najman's mother, trying to come to terms with her daughter's situation has been almost as much of a challenge, but she has also come to accept Mimi's situation.

Ruth Najman, 52, said she "still prays every day," but her sense of religious faith was also compromised by the accident.

"It has definitely weakened it," she said. "I question things more now, although I think it strengthened my perception of humanity, how much love and kindness there is."

Najman said she stays in contact with her daughter by phone and e-mail, travels two or three times a year to see her, and was about to leave again. In the year she was with Mimi after the accident, Najman said, she came to realize that "whatever support I could give her, she had to do it at her own pace, not just because of me pushing her."

Like her daughter, Najman has spent time since the accident learning as much as possible about spinal cord injuries and educating others.

Ideally, she would like to see her daughter return to school, get married and have children, as any mother would want for her child.

"She's so bright," Najman said. "But she has to do it on her own, in her own time."

Try fruit soups for a change of taste

By SYBIL KAPLAN
Special to The CJN

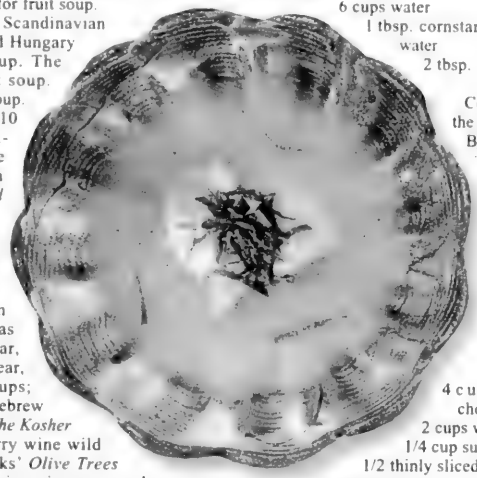
Berry and stone fruit soups are common in the Scandinavian countries and eastern Europe, sometimes with wine, cream or sour cream added.

Mangoes, berries, bananas, cherries, peaches, strawberries, watermelon, cantaloupes and pineapple can all be used for fruit soup.

A specialty of the Scandinavian countries, Russia and Hungary was sour cherry soup. The Polish made apricot soup. Danes made orange soup.

A quick look into 10 recent kosher cookbooks shows that five of them have no such recipes. The World of Jewish Entertaining by Gil Marks has chilled fruit and raspberry wine soups; Kosher Delicious by Diana Kastembaum and Penny Brenner has chilled celery and pear, iced honeydew and pear, and spiced peach soups; the Joseph Kushner Hebrew Academy cookbook, The Kosher Palette, has strawberry wine wild berry soups; Gil Marks' Olive Trees and Honey has Hungarian wine soup; and Congregation Agudat Achim's Divine Kosher Cuisine has apple wine, apple rutabaga, chilled cherry and six fruit soups.

Marlena Spieler's Jewish Cooking, which I consider very Israeli in recipes, has fruit soup and Hungarian cherry soup.



Looking into four Israeli cookbooks, I found only Joan Nathan's The Foods of Israel lists Palestinian fruit and melon soups

Try these for yourselves.

MY ISRAELI FRUIT SOUP

3 cups chopped fruit such as apricots, peaches or plums
1/3 cup sugar
6 cups water
1 tbsp. cornstarch diluted in 1/3 cup water
2 tbsp. lemon juice

Combine in a saucepan the fruit, sugar and water. Bring to a boil, reduce heat and simmer about 15 minutes. Puree in a blender. Add cornstarch and water and lemon juice, return to heat and cook a few minutes until cornstarch is blended.

CHERRY AND WINE SOUP

4 cups sweet black cherries
2 cups water
1/4 cup sugar
1/2 thinly sliced lemon
1 cinnamon stick
1 tbsp. cornstarch
1/4 cup water
1 cup dry red wine
whipped cream

In a saucepan, place cherries, water, sugar, lemon and cinnamon stick. Bring to a boil, reduce heat and simmer 15 minutes.Make a paste of the cornstarch and water. Add to soup. Cook 10 minutes. Remove cinnamon stick. Add wine. Chill. Serve with whipped cream.

PLUM SOUP

1/3 cup water
3/4 cup apple juice
2 pounds pitted plums
1 cinnamon stick
1 whole clove
1/4 cup sugar
1 tbsp. lemon juice
cinnamon

In a saucepan, combine water, apple juice, plums, cinnamon stick, clove, sugar and lemon juice. Bring to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer 15 minutes or until plums are soft.

Remove clove and cinnamon stick. Puree fruit in blender or fruit processor. Pour into bowl, cover and chill. Serve with whipped cream and cinnamon sprinkled on top.

Upside-down cakes good for new or experienced bakers

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

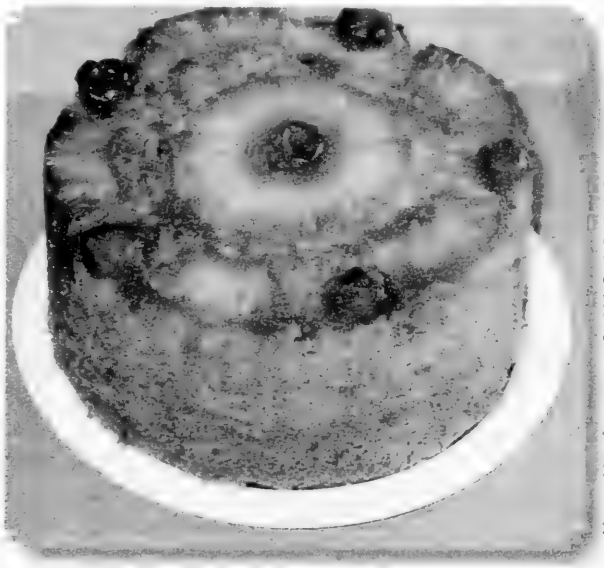
I am often asked to give cooking classes for the 10- to 12-year-old age group. This is the age where children can actually help more than hinder when it comes time to get all the food ready for dinner.

One of the first recipes I give my classes is an upside-down cake. Done right, it's a work of art; done wrong, it looks funny but still tastes good. Everyone always succeeds on some level with this type of cake, so it's really a perfect first choice for a budding chef.

Upside-down cakes, no matter what their specific ingredients, have the same basic components. Butter or margarine, sugar and fruit become caramelized as they bake in a cake pan under a layer of batter. The cake is inverted before it is served, and the glazed fruit becomes the top of the cake. Upside-down cakes originally were made not in cake pans, but rather in well-used cast-iron skillets, and were affectionately called skillet cakes.

The following recipes can be frozen if you want to make them ahead of time. I suggest that, if working with children, you have them read the recipe through two or three times before they tackle it, making sure they understand all the steps needed to ensure a successful outcome.

Cooks will find upside-down cakes extremely versatile because almost any fruit can be used interchangeably. Many of the recipes can be converted from dairy to pareve, but there are a few ingredients (like buttermilk) that there just aren't any really great substitutes for.



CAKE MIX UPSIDE-DOWN CAKE

1 cup oil
1 cup brown sugar, packed well
1 can peach or apricot slices maraschino cherries – halved
2 eggs
1 box white cake mix
whipped cream, optional

Preheat oven to 350. Pour the oil into a 9x13-in. pan and sprinkle the brown sugar evenly in pan over the oil. Drain the peaches, reserving syrup. Arrange the peach slices and cherry halves on top of the sugar mixture.

Add enough water to peach juice to make 1-1/3 cups of liquid. In a bowl, combine the liquid and 2 eggs and add to cake mix. Mix well and pour the batter over the fruit. Bake in a preheated oven for 50 minutes or until cake pulls away from sides of pan. Let stand 5 minutes, then turn upside-down onto a cake dish or large platter. Serve warm with whipped cream or ice cream. Serves 8 to 12.

BLUEBERRY UPSIDE-DOWN CAKE

2 cups fresh or fresh frozen blueberries
1/2 cup sugar
2 tbsp. flour
3 tbsp. freshly grated lemon rind
1/2 cup butter or margarine, softened
1 cup sugar
3 eggs
1 tsp. vanilla extract
1/4 tsp. almond extract
3/4 cup milk or non-dairy substitute
2 cups flour
4 tsp. baking powder
1/4 tsp. salt
1/2 cup toasted slivered almonds sweetened whipped cream or non-dairy topping.

Grease and flour a 9-in. spring form pan. Preheat oven to 350. In a bowl, combine the blueberries, 1/2 cup sugar, 2 tbsp. flour and lemon rind. Spread evenly in the prepared pan.

In the bowl of an electric mixer combine the butter and 1 cup sugar. Beat until fluffy. Add the eggs and extracts to the mixer and mix to combine. Combine the flour, baking powder and salt in a bowl and then add it to the egg mixture alternating it with the milk or non-dairy substitute until just moistened. Pour the batter over the blueberries and spread it evenly, making sure to combine the blueberries into the batter. Bake 60-70 minutes or until a wooden pick inserted in centre comes out clean.

Let sit in pan about 5 minutes. Run a knife around the sides of the pan, then place a serving plate over top of pan; carefully invert cake and plate together. Remove sides from cake pan and carefully take off the bottom of the cake pan, making sure to scrape off any blueberry that sticks. Serve warm, topped with almonds. Garnish with sweetened whipped cream or non-dairy topping as desired. Refrigerate leftovers. Makes 12 servings.

PINEAPPLE MACADAMIA UPSIDE-DOWN CAKE

1/4 cup butter or margarine, melted
1/3 cup firmly packed brown sugar
1/2 cup toasted, chopped macadamia nuts (or pecans)
7 fresh pineapple rings, cut 1/4-inch thick (or canned rings, drained, patted dry)
1 1/4 cups flour
1 cup granulated sugar
2 tsp. baking powder
1/4 tsp. salt
2/3 cup milk or non-dairy substitute
1/4 cup butter or margarine, at room temperature
1 egg
1 tsp. vanilla extract

Cakes have same components

Preheat oven to 350. For topping, pour the 1/4 cup butter or margarine into a 9-in. round cake pan. Sprinkle the pan with the brown sugar and nuts, shifting it from side to side to cover the bottom. Place one pineapple ring in the centre of the pan over nuts. Cut remaining rings in half and arrange in a circular pattern. Set the prepared pan aside.

In the bowl of an electric mixer combine the flour, sugar, baking powder and salt. Mix well and then add the milk or non-diary substitute, butter or margarine, egg and vanilla. Blend at low speed until the dry ingredients are moistened.

Beat 2 minutes at medium speed, scraping sides of bowl occasionally. Pour the batter evenly over the pineapple in the prepared pan. Bake for 40 to 45 minutes or until wooden pick inserted in the centre comes out clean. Let the pan cool on a rack for about 2 to 3 minutes. To remove, run knife around edges of pan. Invert the cake onto serving plate; remove pan. Serve warm or at room temperature. Garnish with whipped cream if desired. Serves 8 to 10.

PEACHY GINGERBREAD UPSIDE-DOWN CAKE

4 cups peeled, coarsely chopped ripe peaches
2 tbsp. light brown sugar
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1 1/2 cups flour
2 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. baking soda
1/2 tsp. salt
2 tsp. ground ginger
1/2 cup unsalted butter or margarine, at room temperature
1/3 cup sugar
1 egg, lightly beaten
1/3 cup molasses
1/2 cup buttermilk

Preheat oven to 350. Lightly butter a 9-inch round cake pan. In a large bowl, toss the peaches with the brown sugar and lemon juice. Spoon the mixture into the prepared cake pan and spread it in an even layer.

In a small bowl, whisk together flour, baking powder, baking soda, salt and ginger. Set aside.

In a large bowl, cream butter and sugar until light and fluffy. Add egg and molasses, and mix until smooth. Add dry ingredients alternately with buttermilk, mixing to form a thick, smooth batter. Spread batter evenly over peaches.

Bake until the cake springs back when lightly touched, 35 to 40 minutes. Cool 5 minutes; then invert the cake onto a large serving platter. Serve warm or at room temperature. Makes 6 servings.

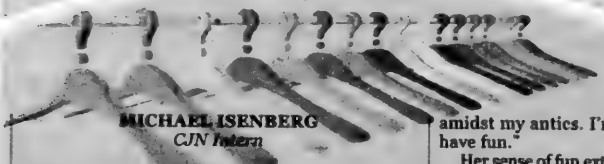
Blog fuels fashion writer's career



MICHAEL ISENBERG
CJN Intern

Randi Bergman is no ordinary girl. She's a Katie Girl.

The 24-year-old fashion writer from Toronto has her own style. She likes to have fun, but she's serious, too. And she dresses the way she wants, regardless of how everyone else looks.

"Fashion is about creating an image, not blending into one," she says.

A graduate of Ryerson University's fashion communications program and currently a freelance writer, Bergman has had early success in the industry, interning for some of North America's biggest fashion magazines, including Teen Vogue.

"The purpose of my style... It's simply being me," Bergman said.

Her blog, thekatiegirls.blogspot.com, is creating a buzz for the "half-silly half-serious" writer, as she calls herself. With the blog, she is developing a fan base and getting nods of approval from other fashion professionals.

In the October issue of FLARE magazine, she was named one of Canada's 30 most inspiring, newsworthy women to watch.

"It's no big deal, really," Bergman says with a hint of excitement in her voice. "I mean, it is an amazing thing, but I don't think I've made a name for myself yet that's warranted such recognition."

The Katie Girls blog, which she originally created with her friend, Robin, whom she met while interning at Interview magazine, is a mix of her opinions and stories on topics that interest her, as well as contributions from her friends.

With no guidelines or boundaries imposed by anyone else, Bergman, who also occasionally freelances for The CJN, is free to write as she pleases in the blog, a very satisfying experience for her. Her writing gives readers a new, refreshing take on fashion. She also tries to give exposure to her friends' art and fashion work by covering their events.

Though the blog is a modest endeavour, its popularity is steadily growing. While Bergman is aware that she's gaining the respect of her peers, she says the blog is really just about expressing herself.

After all, she is a Katie Girl.

That's a reference to Sex and the City, in which "the world is made up of two types of women. The simple girls and the Katie girls," or a woman who acts according to how she thinks and feels and not what the average person would do, Bergman says.

"I'm just different. I like intellectual discussions amidst my antics. I'm a thinker, but I also like to have fun."

Her sense of fun extends to her personal style. She's not one to plan what she's wearing ahead of time.

"I just wake up in the morning and wear whatever inspires me," she says.

She loves bright colours and an outfit that creates excitement, but she shies away from designer clothing because she doesn't like brand names.

"Vintage is my style, with a mix of girly. No button-down shirts for me. Nothing sophisticated, but lots of layers," she says.

She likes to combine and modernize clothing from different times and places.

A Katie Girl, indeed.

Her wardrobe has always been unique, unlike the "boring, torn pajama pants everyone wore in high school to maintain a trend," Bergman says.

"The purpose of my style... it's simply being me."

And it was this pet peeve of conformity and blandness she saw as a high school student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto that prompted Bergman to start writing – critiquing the clothing other students wore, through which she established a reputation as a "fashion informant."

Bergman is certainly not afraid to speak her mind.

She doesn't let others intimidate her, an asset for someone who's spent the better part of the past two years working mostly in New York.

Then again, she's "obsessed" with the city, she says.

It's not surprising then that she wants to make New York, the heart of the fashion magazine industry, her home.

With the partying nightlife in a city that never sleeps, it's a natural fit for it to be the centre of the fashion world, Bergman says. And she wants to be as involved in it as possible.

"There's so much richness there, so many people to write about, so many [fashion] shows. Incredible opportunities," she says.

With plenty happening, it also provides lots of material for Bergman's blog. Even though her goal is to be working for major magazines, she realizes that there is a price to pay for fame.

And this is where her blog is key. For, while she may need a job to support herself, she says ultimately it's important to her to write freely.

With a clear vision for her future, Bergman acknowledges that she may not be curing cancer, but her work is needed.

"Certainly it's an important business, because everyone's affected by it. It doesn't matter if you wear designer clothes or make your own. The second you put on clothing, you show your affiliation and reflect your personality," she says.

"It's interesting stuff to learn about people's creativity and reasons for wearing or creating the clothing they do. This kind of writing is cool."

Bergman sees herself as someone who comments on what others create. The way she writes conveys her personality and opinions, she says, but what she ultimately writes about is other people's expressions of themselves.

"I want to tell other people's stories, but I want to do it my way."

And in doing it her way, the goal-driven Bergman has expectations for herself and won't settle for less than her best, which she says is making it big.

Palestinians, U.S. Jews spar over 'Judaizing' Jerusalem

By NATASHA MOZGAVAYA
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM – The western-backed Palestinian Authority has urged the world to "force [Israel] to put off its attempts to take over Jerusalem and Judaize it," prompting Jews in the United States to vow never to give up their historical right to the ancient city.

The Palestinian cabinet, issuing a strong statement after a meeting in the West Bank town of Ramallah, condemned what it called a plan by Jews to "perform religious rituals" in the Temple Mount compound, which contains the al-Aqsa mosque, Islam's third holiest site.

It also pledged "to confront Israel," as Israeli security forces clashed with Arab protesters for a second day, Oct. 6, in the Jerusalem area.

In response, the leading body of Orthodox Jews in America condemned the Palestinian Authority and the violence exhibited by Palestinian protesters.

"The Palestinians, determined to deny Jewish history and our connection to our eternal capital of Jerusalem, plotted violence as evidenced by stores of rocks and other materials discovered by the Israeli police," Nathan Diament, director of public policy for the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America, said in a statement.

"Jerusalem has been at the centre of Jewish life and faith for thousands of years. Just days ago, at the close of Yom Kippur, Jews around the world declared, as we have for thousands of years, the hope and prayer 'next year in Jerusalem.'"

"A majority of Jews, in the U.S. and Israel, continue to oppose relinquishing Jewish sovereignty over our eternal capital," he added.

"The enemies of our people recognize this, and seek to deny our history. In the face of all this, we reaffirm that 'for the sake of Zion we will not be silent' and we will not allow history to be denied."

Palestinians have warned that the tensions flaring over access to the holy compound housing the al-Aqsa mosque, an area also revered by Jews as the site of an ancient temple, could, on the background of stalled peace talks, ignite a third uprising.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has conditionally agreed to a Palestinian state alongside Israel, but peace talks have remained stalled for months despite U.S. efforts to revive them.

Violence in Jerusalem flared on Oct. 4 after Israel briefly shut the gates leading to the compound around al-Aqsa, known to Muslims as the Noble Sanctuary and to Jews as the Temple Mount, citing concerns for possible violence as hundreds of Jews held holiday prayers at the adjacent Western Wall.

The gates were partly reopened once calm was restored after stone-throwing protests by Palestinians in anger at being kept from reaching the holy site. There was no violence in the area on Oct. 5 when thousands of Jews worshipped at the Western Wall.

Israel's road traffic could power country

By AVI BAR-EL
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

TEL AVIV — An Israeli company has developed a method of generating electricity from road traffic, and Israel may look to implement the system on the nation's highways.

The system works by using generators implanted in the asphalt that create energy when cars drive over them. Each generator produces 2,000 watts per hour, which is stored in batteries along the side of the road.

The technology was developed by the Israeli firm Innowattech, with the cooperation of the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology.

A trial of the system was performed earlier this month along a 10-metre stretch of asphalt on one of the country's highways. The experiment was viewed as a success, with passing cars providing the power for street lights set up next to the 10-metre strip.

The manager of the project, Lucy Edri-Azoulay, said the generators were planted two inches below the top level of asphalt and used the weight of cars driving on top of them to generate electricity.

She explained that the technology driving the system is based on piezoelectric materials, which generate electricity in response to applied mechanical stress.

Installing the program on a single traffic lane stretching one kilometre would produce 200 kilowatts of electricity per hour and a four-lane highway with the system implemented would produce a megawatt of electricity every hour, enough to power 2,500 households, Edri-Azoulay said.

She added that the system could be used to power electrical installations along the road, providing power for traffic lights, cameras and streetlights.

The system would not be dependent on weather and does not require the construction of large-scale infrastructure.

Obama Nobel partly about Mideast peace hopes

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd. and JTA

JERUSALEM — The chairman of the Nobel Peace Prize committee cited U.S. President Barack Obama's outreach to the Muslim world and his push for Israeli-Arab peace in explaining the shock decision to give the award to Obama last week, just nine months into his presidency.

"One of the first things he did was to go to Cairo to try to reach out to the Muslim world, then to restart the Mideast negotiations and then he reached out to the rest of the world through international institutions," Thorbjorn Jagland said in Oslo Friday after announcing that Obama had won the prize.

He said Obama won for giving the world "hope for a better future" and striving for nuclear disarmament, but the surprise award drew both praise and sharp criticism.

The decision to bestow one of the world's top accolades on a president who has yet to score a major foreign policy success was greeted with gasps of astonishment from journalists at the announcement.

The Norwegian Nobel Committee praised Obama for "his extraordinary efforts to strengthen international diplomacy and cooperation between peoples." But critics – especially in parts of the Arab and Muslim world – called its decision premature.

Obama's press secretary woke him with the news before dawn and the president felt "humbled" by the award, a senior administration official said. When told that many people around the world were stunned by the announcement, Obama's senior adviser, David Axelrod, responded: "As are we."

Barack Obama

The first African-American to hold his country's highest office, Obama, 48, has called for disarmament and worked to restart the stalled Middle East peace process since taking office in January.

"Very rarely has a person to the same extent as Obama captured the world's attention and given its people hope for a better future," the committee said in a citation.

"President Obama deserves recognition and praise for making Middle East peace a top U.S. foreign policy priority from his first moments in the Oval Office," said spokesperson Ori Nir. "We hope that winning the prestigious prize will further energize the president and his aides to push for peace between Israel and her neighbours."

While the decision also won praise from statesmen such as Nelson Mandela and Mikhail Gorbachev, both former Nobel laureates, it was also attacked in some quarters as hasty and undeserved.

The Palestinian Islamist movement Hamas, which controls Gaza and opposes a peace treaty with Israel, said the award was premature. "Obama has a long way to go still and lots of work to do before he can deserve a reward," said Hamas official Sami Abu Zuhri. "Obama only made promises and did not contribute any substance to world peace. And he has not done anything to ensure justice for the sake of Arab and Muslim causes."

But the chief Palestinian peace negotiator, Saeb Erekat, welcomed it and expressed hope that Obama "will be able to achieve peace in the Middle East."

Jagland rejected suggestions from journalists that Obama was getting the prize too early, saying it recognized what he had already done over the past year. "We hope this can contribute a little bit to enhance what he is trying to do," he told reporters.

The committee said it attached "special importance to Obama's vision of and work for a world without nuclear weapons," saying he had "created a new climate in international politics."

Without naming Obama's predecessor George W. Bush, it highlighted the differences in America's engagement with the rest of the world since the change of administration in January.

"Multilateral diplomacy has regained a central position, with emphasis on the role that the United Nations and other international institutions can play."

Iran to 'blow up' Israel' if attacked

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran would "blow up the heart" of Israel if Israel or the United States attacked the Islamic Republic, a Revolutionary Guards official said in comments published on Friday.

"Even if one American or Zionist missile hits our country, before the dust settles, Iranian missiles will blow up the heart of Israel," the official IRNA news agency quoted Mojtaba Zolnour as saying.

He is a deputy representative of Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei in the elite Guards force. Iranian officials have also in the past said the country would retaliate in case of any Israeli or U.S attack on it.

Earlier this year, a senior commander said Iranian missiles could reach Israeli nuclear sites. Israel is believed to be the only nuclear-armed Middle East state.

Israel has not ruled out military action if diplomacy fails to end a dispute over Iran's nuclear ambitions, echoing U.S. policy, although Washington is engaged in a drive to resolve the issue through direct talks with Iran.

Prof has won many awards

She has won many prizes for her research in recent years, including the Israel Prize in chemistry and the Wolf Prize in chemistry.

This year's three laureates all generated three-dimensional models that show how different antibiotics bind to ribosomes.

"These models are now used by scientists in order to develop new antibiotics, directly assisting the saving of lives and decreasing humanity's suffering," the academy said in its announcement.

"All three have used a method called X-ray crystallography to map the position for each and every one of the hundreds of thousands of atoms that make up the ribosome," the academy said.

Alfred Nobel, a Swedish industrialist who invented dynamite, established the Nobel Prizes in his will in 1895. The first awards were handed out six years later.

Each prize comes with a 10 million kronor ($1.4 million) purse, a diploma, a gold medal and an invitation to the prize ceremony in Stockholm on Dec. 10. The Peace Prize is handed out in Oslo.

Israeli physicist Yakir Aharonov was not selected as the winner of the Nobel Prize for physics, despite predictions that he was likely to win. The committee awarded the physics prize to engineers, including Canadian Willard Boyle, who developed the mechanism used in digital photography.

The last Israeli to receive a Nobel Prize was Yisrael Robert Aumann, who was awarded the prize in economics in 2005 for his work on conflict and co-operation through game-theory analysis. He shared the prize with Thomas Schelling.

In the late 1970s, when she was a student at Weizmann Institute, Yonath decided to take on the challenge of answering one of the key questions concerning the activities of live cells: to decipher the structure and mechanism of ribosomes – the cell's protein factories. Her work began in a modest laboratory with a modest budget. Over the years, the laboratory and the budget grew to accommodate tens of researchers under her guidance.

Her research eventually led to the understanding of how a number of antibiotics function, which will likely aid in the development of more advanced and effective antibiotics.

It will also help in the struggle against antibiotic-resistant bacteria, a problem recognized as one of the most central medical challenges of the 21st century.

Ya'alon cancels London trip

Strategic Affairs Minister Moshe Ya'alon cancelled a scheduled trip to attend a fundraising dinner in London planned by the British Jewish National Fund. The Israeli Foreign Ministry's legal department advised Ya'alon that pro-Palestinian groups could ask a British court to have him arrested and put on trial for war crimes, specifically the assassination of a senior Hamas terrorist in 2002, in which 14 civilians were killed. Ya'alon served as chief of staff of the Israel Defence Forces at the time of the assassination. The Israeli legal team warned that he likely would not be given diplomatic immunity. A lawsuit could be filed under the 1988 Criminal Justice Act, which gives courts in England and Wales universal jurisdiction in war crimes cases. The cancellation came less than a week after a British attorney filed a lawsuit against Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak on behalf of several Palestinian families who were victims of Israel's war against Hamas. A London judge ruled that while Barak's war crimes were well documented, he enjoyed diplomatic immunity because of his meetings with British officials.

Lieberman: No chance for peace

Avigdor Lieberman said there is no chance of ending the Israeli-Palestinian conflict for many years. The Israeli foreign minister made the statement last week, just hours before he met with George Mitchell, the U.S. envoy to the Middle East. Mitchell met earlier with President Shimon Peres and was to meet with Defence Minister Ehud Barak. Foreign Ministry staff called Lieberman's meeting with Mitchell "very good," but did not release details. Israel and the Palestinians should work toward an interim agreement and leave a long term deal for "much later," Lieberman said.

Jews and the Temple Mount

Rabbi Yosel Sholom Elyashiv told President Shimon Peres last week that Jews are forbidden, according to Jewish law, to ascend to the Temple Mount and that such visits -- which he termed a "provocation" -- could lead to violence and death. "I have declared this in the past, and I repeat once again my statement," he said. "Beyond the halachic aspect, it is also a kind of provocation of the world's nations that could lead to bloodshed, and this would be one sin leading to another." Elyashiv is the leader of the Lithuanian sect of the fervently Orthodox Ashkenazi community and lives in the Jerusalem neighborhood of Mea Shearim.

Swine flu deaths total 31

Israel raised its swine flu death toll to 31. Medical authorities added to the toll an Afula Hospital patient hospitalized last month in the final stages of a terminal disease. Doctors believe swine flu accelerated the man's death.

Where did two Iranian nuclear scientists disappear to?

By YOSSI MELMAN

JERUSALEM – Two Iranian nuclear scientists disappeared over the past weeks and allegedly defected to the West, the London-based pan-Arabic daily Asharq al-Awsat reported

According to the report, the first defector is Sharam Amiri, a scientist in Iran's nuclear program who was likely tied to the recently discovered secret uranium enrichment plant near the holy city of Qom.

Amiri disappeared in Saudi Arabia in July while he was on the hajj pilgrimage to Mecca

Defection speculations have been gaining popularity in light of an announcement made by Iran's foreign ministry that it had asked Saudi officials to help locate Amiri. This announcement is unusual because many Iranians go missing during the annual hajj pilgrimage, and in those cases, not only is there no foreign ministry announcement, usually there is no effort made to locate them, despite their families' pleas.

The foreign ministry announcement indicates that Amiri may have a particularly sensitive position in the Iranian nuclear program.

The report regarding the second scientist is also strange. Asharq al-Awsat uses only his surname – Ardebili. He was allegedly arrested in Georgia a few weeks ago. Reports say that Ardebili worked in the Iranian nuclear program as well, but the Iranian foreign ministry fervently denies these claims, and maintains that Ardebili was a businessman who was extradited to the United States following his arrest.

If the report is correct and two scientists from Iran's nuclear program indeed defected, it would be a harsh blow to Iran and its nuclear plans on the one hand, and a triumph on the part of western intelligence on the other.

In 2007, the former Iranian deputy defence minister and senior member of the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Ali Reza Asgari defected to the West. Several reports linked both the American CIA and the Israeli Mossad to the operation.

Noam Schalit hails Sarkozy's efforts for Gilad's release

By JACK KHOURY

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — The father of abducted Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit lauded the efforts of Nicolas Sarkozy to secure his son's release, after a meeting with the French president at the Elysee Palace in Paris.

"It appears that President Sarkozy is working out of a personal commitment for Gilad's release," said Schalit. "The subject is in his soul, and I know that this is not just about words but deeds as well."

Schalit, who was in Paris in order to urge France to push for his son's release, spoke with Sarkozy for about 20 minutes in a meeting last Thursday that was described as "very moving." He wanted to thank the French leader for his efforts, but at the close of the meeting, Sarkozy said he refused to accept his thanks as long as Gilad was not home.

While Schalit did not reveal any more of the meeting's content, his associates did confirm a report in Ha'aretz that Sarkozy has sent a message recently to Syrian President Bashar Assad asking him to pressure the Hamas leadership in Damascus to close a deal for the soldier's release.

Ahead of the meeting with Sarkozy, Schalit said he saw no immediate hope that his son would be freed soon, despite Hamas' release of a video on Oct. 2 showing him alive, AFP reported.

"We were moved to see him after so much time, after a period in which we hadn't even received a photo of him," Schalit told the French news agency during his trip to Paris.

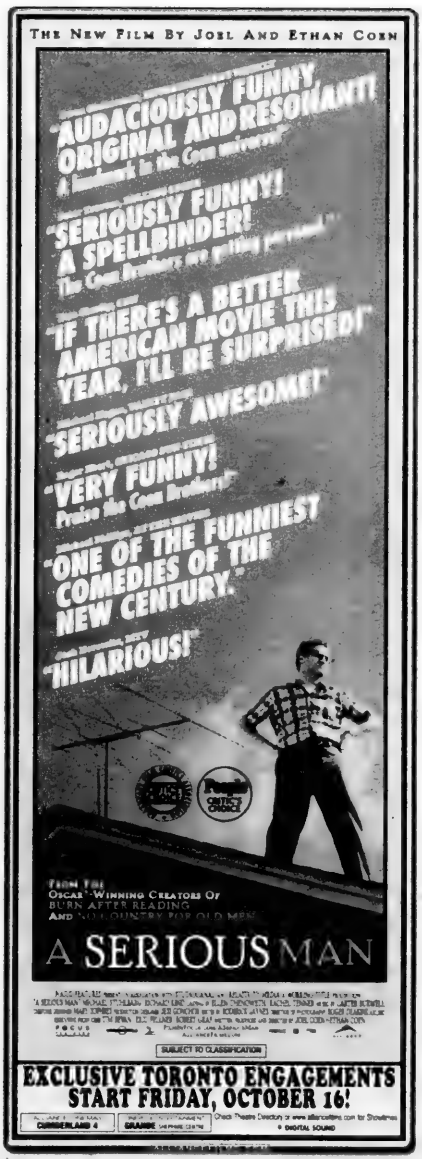
"On the other hand, we are very worried, we don't see light at the end of the tunnel," Schalit was quoted as saying.

Israel received the first footage showing Gilad Schalit looking healthy on Oct. 2, after more than three years of captivity in Gaza, where he is being held by Palestinian militants.

The video was sent in exchange for Israel's release of 20 Palestinian women prisoners.

The exchange was widely seen as the biggest breakthrough since Gaza militants kidnapped Schalit in a 2006 cross-border raid. But Noam Schalit, whose son is also a French citizen, was not so hopeful last Thursday.

"For us, it is a step in the right direction, but that doesn't mean that a deal on prisoners is close. There has been no breakthrough," AFP quoted him as saying. But the decision by Hamas, the Islamist group that rules Gaza, to release the video was "a sign that they are under pressure and they want to move things forward," he said, according to the news agency.



West Bank Palestinians stand fast on right of return

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to The CJN

BETHLEHEM — Although many Palestinians in the West Bank say they are interested in "peace," the vast majority of those encountered on a recent visit to the area, insisted that Palestinian refugees and their descendants have a right to return to homes and villages they left during the 1948 Israeli War of Independence.

Osama Alhrithi, a fourth-year law student at Al-Quds University in Jerusalem, said that even if Israel went back to the Green Line, Israel's pre-1967 borders, and the West Bank and all Jewish settlements over the Green Line were dismantled, "any Palestinian refugee who wants to return to his home that he left in 1948 should be able to come back… There are a lot of Palestinian refugees in Jordan and Lebanon, and if they want to come back, that is their holy right."

Alhrithi's view that Israel – rather than a future Palestinian state – ought to be obliged to take in waves of Palestinian refugees was typical even among those who said they supported Fatah, not Hamas. It was also the predominant view among those people whom The CJN encountered at a conference devoted to promoting dialogue and peace, held in Beit Jalla, a suburb of Jerusalem, put on by the Israel-Palestine Centre for Research and Information this past summer.

Ra'id Abdalla Otair, director of the Palestinian Authority's ministry of health in Tulkarem, said: "All refugees in Syria, Jordan, Lebanon and elsewhere should be asked to come back to their land in Israel – in Haifa, and Jaffa and Akko."

Ra'id Abdalla Otair

Otair, who is also the representative for the NGO, Future Vision, dismissed the possibility that Palestinian refugees would receive some form of financial compensation and return only to a future Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza. "People in Tulkarem like [to have] all Palestine," he said.

Badia Dweik, who also works for the PA in Hebron and who also attended the conference, said he became disenchanted with Fatah after former PA president Yasser Arafat signed the Oslo accords, because, among other things, it didn't deal with the refugee issue.

"The two-state solution is a big lie… Most of my friends are pushing for a one-state solution [where Jews would be a minority in a Palestinian majority between the Mediterranean and the Jordan River]. When there is 'one state,' the Palestinian refugees can live wherever they want. Maybe the refugee can come back to the same house he left if it is still there. Maybe a refugee from Lebanon can come back to Haifa, and even if his house has been demolished, he can still live in that area."

Sumayah Soboh, a Muslim sociologist from Bethlehem, who also advocates a one-state solution, said: "Any Palestinian refugees who want can return to their land… Maybe the one state could be called 'Jew Palestina'… I am angry with Fatah for saying there could be two states. There shouldn't be a Jewish state, but just one state, one leader, one God, one people."

Firas Arafat, a pharmacist from Hebron, said that only if Israel returned to the pre-67 borders and dismantled all of settlements would he agree to forgo the right of return.

"I know [former U.S. president] Jimmy Carter just came to the Gush Etzion Jewish settlement [in June 2009] and told the Jews there that they would remain part of Israel in the future. I respect Jimmy Carter, but I don't agree. Israel must get out of every Jewish settlement in the West Bank."

Mari Sadi, a Christian Palestinian artist from Bethlehem, said "we hope that all of the refugees will be able to come back… I have many relatives in Jordan and the U.S. and a lot of different lands. They are from Nazareth and Haifa and Jaffa, and they should be able to come back. They will want to come back."

Inam Mitwassi and Laila Nazzal, Christian Palestinian artisans in Bethlehem, agreed with Sadi that Israel should go back to the '67 line and Palestinian refugees should be able to return to the pre-67 Israel.

Lorette Zoughbi, who runs a small patisserie in Bethlehem, said she accepted the two-state solution. "If we ask for everything, all we'll get is nothing."

But then she added, "My grandfather had a house in Katamon and in Jaffa. I still have the keys. We'll never give up our land."

Only a small number of Palestinians who spoke with The CJN appeared willing to make concessions regarding the issue of Palestinian refugees.

Fatima Faroun, a Muslim Palestinian from Bethany, said she believed "there should be " Palestine and Israel," and she added, "We must finish this conflict. To end it, refugees should return only to the Palestinian state."

Watch out for the Goldstoners

By ARI SHAVIT
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Nobody knows yet when the next war will break out. Maybe in a decade, maybe in a year or maybe even next month. It's also not clear where the next war will erupt – perhaps on the Gaza border, perhaps the West Bank or maybe in Jerusalem.

But it is already clear what the next war's name will be – the Goldstone War. It will be the war brought upon us by the Goldstone report, Judge Richard Goldstone and his Goldstoner followers.

It's a simple story. In the absence of peace in the Middle East, deterrence prevents war. Israeli deterrence has been eroded considerably by two Lebanon wars, two intifadahs and two unilateral withdrawals. Thus Israel is incessantly subjected to terror attacks.

To prevent the region's deterioration into complete chaos, Israel must exercise force once every few years. These limited demonstrations of power do not achieve a decisive military victory or a breakthrough in the peace process.

Their entire purpose is to stabilize the violent relationship between Israelis and Arabs. Thus they create a temporary, strong-arm balance that subdues the conflict and ensures calm for a few years.

For better or worse, Operation Cast Lead created such a balance. It weakened Hamas and deterred it, at a terrible human cost. It strengthened the moderate Palestinians and enabled them to grow, at an intolerable moral cost.

Cast Lead granted Israel's southern residents a rare time-out. Brutal as it was, the operation created an infrastructure of stability on which it was possible to build – layer by layer – a new, sober peace process.

Judge Richard Goldstone

However, in recent weeks, the balance has been disrupted. Hamas is rearing its head, while the Palestinian moderates are becoming more radical. A trickle of Qassam rocket fire has resumed in the south, while the embers on the Temple Mount are glowing red-hot.

This is no coincidence. The Goldstone report and the Goldstone spirit are causing a situation in which the deterrence that was achieved for such a high price at the beginning of the year could expire prematurely. They are bringing the next round of Israeli-Palestinian war closer.

Comment

More than enough has been written about Goldstone's double standard. However, today it is clear that Goldstone is not only guilty of a double standard (see Pakistan, Afghanistan, Iraq, Sri Lanka, Tibet…), but of a double political crime.

With one hand, he pushed peace further away, by making it clear that even after Israel withdraws to the Green Line, Israel's pre-1967 borders, it is not permitted to defend its citizens and its sovereignty.

With the other hand, he brought war closer, by binding Israel in a straitjacket that prevents it from exercising its power in the future. On the one hand, Goldstone played into the hands of some of Israel's right-wingers by increasing the risks of withdrawal. On the other hand, he inflamed Palestinian extremism by essentially burning Israel at the stake.

The Palestinians see Goldstone as a sort of Delilah, who found the Israeli Samson's weakness and sheared off his tresses. This can lead to only one outcome – violence and more violence, more and more violence – up to war.

The problem isn't just Goldstone. The problem is the Goldstoners. For decades, the Goldstone bunch has been conducting an insane incitement campaign against Israel. Israel contributed its part to this campaign with the occupation, the settlements and its arrogance. But the Goldstoners are not driven by an honest attempt to divide the land, create peace and establish universal justice that would apply to all nations. They are driven by a deep need to isolate Israel, condemn it and destroy it.

Although some of the leading Goldstoners are Jews and Israelis, they don't recognize Jewish history, the Jewish tragedy and the difficult circumstances in which the Jewish state is trying to survive. They treat Israel like a wicked, omnipotent power that is responsible for all the conflict's sins and the region's ills.

The Goldstone report would never have been written without the joint work, joint bias and joint Israel-hatred of all the Goldstoners. Thus the report reflects both the Goldstoners' holy fury and their complete belief that the Palestinians can do no wrong.

That belief is now endangering not only Israel but calm and stability. In their fanaticism and extremism, the Goldstoners have brought us closer to bloodshed.

Noah Alper writes inspirational business book

By DOROTHY LIPOVENKO
Special to The CJN

In the 1969 movie of Philip's Roth's novel Goodbye, Columbus, businessman Ben Patimkin (played by the ever wonderful Jack Klugman) finishes barking at a supplier on the phone and turns to his daughter's boyfriend seated in his office. "What do they teach in college these days...? Let me tell you something: in the real world, you need a little ganiff in you. You know what that means, ganiff?" And the nice Jewish boy replies in that sardonic way that only actor Richard Benjamin can: "Thief."

Fast forward to the present, to businessman Noah Alper of Berkeley, Calif., who sold his Noah's Bagels chain in 1996 for $100 million; whose employees painted schools and helped in soup kitchens, even before a store would open in a neighbourhood; whose newly released Business Mensch: Timeless Wisdom for Today's Entrepreneur (Wolfeboro Press) is a welcome and much-needed antidote for on-screen ganiffs and real-world ones like Bernard Madoff.

Noah Alper

Alper's timing couldn't be better. Business Mensch, which goes nicely with coffee and a shmeared bagel, and can be finished in less time than a movie, is just what we need to buck us up in a post-Madoff world. As readers move through Alper's eclectic, successful career as a serial entrepreneur (his venture to sell Holy Land products to evangelical Christians flopped), we see how this son of an atheist father (who still raised money for Israel bonds) integrates Jewish values and ethics into his business practices.

And we begin to feel better already.

Written with Thomas Fields-Meyer, Business Mensch suggests a modern-day Maimonides' Guide for the (business-minded) Perplexed, aiming to "set the record straight about the relevance of Jewish values to running a business with honesty, integrity and ethics."

Alper says he was "personally pained" to watch the Madoff scandal unfolding – Jewish law and wisdom does everything to preach against [greed]" – but in place of hand-wringing, we get an uplifting reminder.

"Truly using Jewish values in business leads only to doing the right thing: serving the community, treating employees and customers with fairness and respect, dealing honestly and openly and helping those in need."

Opening up personally and professionally, Alper, 62, tells his story in a breezy style and a heimische voice, walking us through his suburban Boston childhood, his early nose for business shovelling snowy sidewalks as a kid, and the enjoyment of serving his customers (while learning to deal with the occasional tightwad). Most of all, he impresses upon us how much of his business menschlichkeit was learned at his parents' kitchen table.

But make no mistake: Alper is smart, in that vision-thing way of successful entrepreneurs (indeed, the bagel idea began to percolate after he watched a video about a Montreal bagel store), and he's an extremely astute businessman (selling the Noah's chain little more than six years after opening the first location). Prior to the bagel biz, he had founded the Bread and Circus grocery stores, now part of the Whole Foods Market chain.

While the book is undeniably his story – including how he found his way to Israel and then later, observant Judaism in midlife – Alper draws on his experience at Noah's Bagels as a teaching template for Jewish values.

In one chapter, he speaks almost reverentially about Shabbat and bringing rest into one's life. But he never gets preachy, just pragmatic: "The point isn't that every entrepreneur needs Shabbat per se. It's that you need to build pauses – in months, days or even minutes – into your life and even into your business."

In the chapter It Takes a Shtetl, Alper builds on Ben-Zoma's quote in Pirkei Avot – "Who is wise? The one who learns from all people" – as a reminder that "in the Jewish outlook, wisdom comes from learning from people." And not just from a few.

> A modern-day Maimonides guide

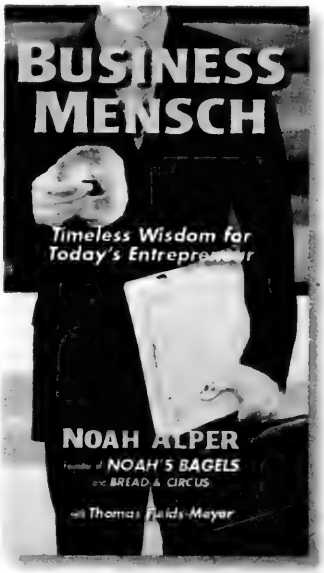
Alper credits similar, early life lessons to his father, David, who "had a great sense of humility and respect for people who did their jobs well... whether a waiter or a lawyer."

He notes that while his father regarded fair play and honouring people's dignity as universal values, "I have always believed that they were deeply rooted in his own parents and grandparents' Jewish identity."

And how did the son put that into practice? Several ways, but one anecdote stands out to my mind: Alper consulted his front-line workers, many of them students, for feedback on the food display cases and what they'd do differently to improve the customer experience. (Take note: not only could these kids take the day off before a big exam, but it was policy that employees could eat what, and how much, they wanted, gratis, except for the pricey lox, which they got at a discount.)

While no one joins the entrepreneurial ranks to lose money, Alper shows that a business can and should practise outreach in its neighbourhoods to advance the Jewish precept of tikkun olam. When employees take part in community service, as they did at Noah's Bagels, they are the public face of the company. And that brand becomes vested in the minds of customers as socially responsible and caring. Win-win.



Much of Alper's message seems so simple and self-evident, yet clearly, in light of what has happened recently, it can't be repeated often enough: "Act like a mensch – a good, decent person," he urges, noting that Jewish parents have passed down this advice to their children for generations.

And what, exactly, is a business mensch?

"As the old expression goes, there's a difference between a 'man in business' and a 'businessman,'" Alper notes. The former "goes through the motions," while the latter, among other things, is insightful, resourceful and competitive.

A business mensch "combines these qualities with an ethical backbone and has a 'shine' that is palpable... often it is the mensch who leads the way, both in business and life."

Now a consultant to aspiring and established entrepreneurs, Alper will be speaking at the Toronto Jewish Book Fair on Oct. 27, at 8:00 p.m. at the Koffler Centre. For more information, visit www.kofflerarts.org.

Israel Film Festival opens Oct. 18

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When Eran Bester worked in Canada as the Bank Leumi's representative in Montreal from 2004 to 2007, he was struck by the fact that so many Canadians had a one-sided view of Israel.

He was "deeply disappointed" that their knowledge, if not perception, of Israel was gleaned almost exclusively from the endless violence of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Bester believes there's much more to Israel than its long-simmering dispute with the Arab world and the Palestinians, and he wracked his brain to find a way to show Israeli society in all its facets and dimensions.

Although he's not strictly a cinephile,

Waltz with Bashir

Bester, an investor who lives in Tel Aviv today, decided he could best achieve this objective by conveying Israel's complexities through the medium of Israeli movies.

In 2005, he organized the first Israel Film Festival in Montreal, and two years ago, at the behest of the Israeli government, he brought the festival to Toronto.

Since then, the not-for-profit festival has opened in Montreal in May and in Toronto in October.

This year's Toronto edition takes place Oct. 18 to 22 at the Sheppard Grande Cinema and is supported by Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the Israeli Ministry of Tourism, United King Films – Israel's largest movie distributor – and the Rabinovich Foundation Project.

Films start at 6:30 p.m. and 9 p.m.

"We try to screen the best Israeli films," he said. "They show Israel from every conceivable angle and show that Israelis don't walk the street with guns."

According to Bester, the Israeli film industry makes about 25 movies a year, of which about one-third are of good and exportable quality.

At last year's festival, there were usually full houses, said Besser, who runs it as a labour of love and comes to Canada to organize it in both cities.

It's followed by Waltz with Bashir, an animated film about the 1982 war in Lebanon and a contender for the best foreign film at the 2009 Academy Awards.

Also on the program are Ushpizin, which profiles a haredi family in Jerusalem; Three Mothers, which draws a portrait of three Egyptian sisters who settle in Israel as new immigrants; Lost Islands, which focuses on twin brothers who fall in love with the same woman; Bonjour Mr. Shlomi, which charts the life of a self-effacing humanitarian; Salt of the Earth, which documents the making of what seems like a perfect crime; and James' Journey to Jerusalem, which documents the travails of an African man in Israel.

Guest speaker Oded Adomi Leshem, an

Ushpizin

Israeli filmmaker and lecturer, will introduce most of the films.

Ron Ben-Yishai, an Israeli journalist who covered Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon, will discuss Waltz with Bashir after its screening.

Tickets are $13 per film. Students with ID can get in free, subject to availability five minutes prior to a screening.

Documentary recalls life and work of sitcom pioneer

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Called "the first lady of radio," Gertrude Berg was the "Oprah" of her time. She wrote some 12,000 scripts, was a star on radio and a pioneer of television sitcoms. She also wrote a best-selling cookbook, had an advice column and her own clothing line. Yet, few people these days know who she was.

Documentary filmmaker Aviva Kempner (The Life and Times of Hank Greenberg) is hoping to change that with the theatrical release of her latest film, Yoo-Hoo Mrs. Goldberg, which chronicles the rise of Berg and her popular radio and television show, The Goldbergs.

Berg, a third-generation American, was born Tillie Edelstein in New York City in 1898, and became immortalized when, for 25 years, she played the role of Molly Goldberg in the show she created.

But it wasn't intended to be that way. Originally, after creating the characters for the show while working at her father's hotel in the Hamptons, Berg had only intended to write the show. However when CBS greenlighted her project, she filled in for the role of Molly until another actress could be found. Her character was an instant success, and the network knew it had a hit on its hands, and wisely offered her the role.

The radio show debuted just after the Stock Market crash of 1929. Berg was the creator, principal writer and star.

Such was the show's popularity in the '30s that a story goes that Franklin Delano Roosevelt himself said that he wasn't the one who ended the Depression, "it was the Goldbergs." The show was second in popularity only to Amos 'n' Andy, and a poll conducted in the early '30s showed Berg to be the second-most respected woman in America, after Eleanor Roosevelt.

"You didn't have to be Jewish to love Molly," Kemper says. "She was admired by millions, of all backgrounds, as they sat with families and friends around their radios and televisions."

On her radio show, Berg was a stickler for authenticity. She had Yiddish actors portray the roles and had a real rabbi perform a seder on the radio show. Aware of the anti-Semitism prevalent in Europe as well as America in the '30s, she had one show where she was consoling her family when a rock was thrown through her window during a Passover seder.

The Goldbergs made a successful transition to television in 1949 and established the modern-day sitcom as we know it today. It revolved around the Goldbergs, a Jewish family with two teenagers living in the tenements of the Lower East Side. It captured the insanity of living in an apartment building with very little privacy.

Molly frequently gossiped and dished advice to her neighbours through the window across the alleyway above the clotheslines. Her neighbours would always call out to her: "Yoo-hoo, Mrs. Goldberg!" when they had something to tell her. With her Yiddish accent and her Old World sensibilities, Goldberg was in fact a far cry from Berg herself, who lived on Park Avenue, wore luxurious clothing and did not speak with a Yiddish accent or use malapropisms.

It also hit the big screen in 1950 as Molly.

The show ran into trouble early in the '50s during the McCarthy witch hunt against perceived communism in the media. Berg's co-star Philip Loeb, a strong campaigner for actors' rights, was placed on Senator Joseph McCarthy's notorious blacklist and the sponsors threatened to pull out unless Loeb was replaced. Berg fought this, but in the end conceded, and Loeb was bought off.

Gertrude Berg as Molly Goldberg

However, the show never recovered, especially when the network ill-advisedly moved the setting from the Lower East Side to the suburbs.

Yoo-Hoo Mrs. Goldberg is a documentary both about The Goldbergs and about Berg herself, and blends the two stories seamlessly.

After her TV show's run, Berg continued acting, winning a Tony for her onstage role in Majority of One, and she became the highest paid guest star on television shows of the day.

The documentary is flawless. You don't have to have heard of Berg or Molly Goldberg to enjoy it. The Goldbergs pioneered the sitcom, paving the way for for I Love Lucy, All in the Family and even Seinfeld. Gertrude Berg and Molly Goldberg deserve the recognition this film gives them.

Documentary charts decline of New York's garment industry

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Marc Levin's film Schmatta: Rags to Riches to Rags is a lament for a declining but once vibrant American industry in which Jews, particularly new Jewish immigrants, played an integral role.

His documentary on New York City's formerly bustling garment district, which premiered at the Toronto International Film Festival last month, will have its broadcast premiere on HBO Canada on Monday, Oct. 19, at 9 p.m.

Levin calls a spade a spade, warning that financial and social forces are destroying the U.S. clothing industry, which enabled many of its workers to enter the middle class and thereby achieve the American dream.

Statistics cited by Levin tell the story succinctly. Ninety-five per cent of American clothing was manufactured in the United States in 1965, but today the figure has fallen to five per cent.

"Everything is made in China today," complains garment worker Joe Raico, a fabric cutter of Jewish and Italian heritage who was president of a union. "My industry has just about had it."

He's right.

Forty years ago, New York's fashion industry, concentrated in a one-square-mile area in Manhattan's West Side, was the lifeblood of the city, its biggest single employer. "This city, in many ways, was made by the schmatta business," says a man who has earned a living by it.

But nowadays, as Raico observes in this trenchant film, things are very different. "We're down to a shrinking industry," he says. "We're not producing anymore."

The garment district in New York City

Fastforwarding to the present, Levin states that the industry was once a microcosm of the U.S. economy, a source of steady employment and upward social mobility for the working class.

"There were jobs on every block," a man says. "There were a zillion places to go to."

But in the face of stiff competition from Asian and Latin American countries, where wages are low and unionization is non-existent, blue-collar jobs in America began disappearing.

Globalization and outsourcing, however, are not the sole reasons for the decline of the industry. Automation and deregulation have had an effect, too.

Apart from being a report about the current state of the industry, Schmatta is also a capsule history of it in the 20th century.

Before the rise of the unions, workers often toiled in sweatshops, as flickering images from the disastrous 1911 Triangle Shirtwaist factory fire in Manhattan confirm. More than 100 young women lost their lives in this tragedy, but it proved to be a turning point, ushering in reforms that inspired President Franklin Delano Roosevelt's New Deal and strengthening the bargaining power of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union.

In charting its influence on American society, Levin spices his film with animated clips of labour leaders Sidney Hillman and David Dubinsky and of John F. Kennedy campaigning for the U.S. presidency in the garment district.

By way of further illustrating its impact, Levin relates the stories of designers such as Ralph Lauren, Calvin Klein and Isaac Mizrahi. He also interviews Bruce Raynor, the president of a union whose effort to organize workers was dramatized in the 1979 Hollywood movie Norma Rae.

In an ironic twist, Levin points out that sweatshop conditions are as common in China today as they were in the United States several generations ago.

As the adage goes, the more things change, the more they remain the same.

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Veteran film, television and stage actor Bernie Kopell, best known for his role as Dr. Adam Bricker on The Love Boat, is starring in the uplifting comedy Viagara Falls at Mississauga's Stage West Theatre Restaurant until Nov. 22.

The show involves two retired widowers, Charley Millhouse and his friend Moe Krubbs. Adding to the mix is a buxom call girl and Viagra. Viagara Falls examines the bond between these two men and their desire to feel wanted.

Kopell, 76, says it is actually a love story between two human beings who have bonded together for their own comfort and economic reasons.

"The play deals authentically and comedically with real issues that men have with their appearance below the waist and with their feelings about their ability to perform below their waist," Kopell says.

The two were soldiers in the Korean War, during which Moe (Kopell) saved Charley's life.

"Now, when the play picks up we are widowers on pensions," Kopell says. Charley gets a notice from the veterans' association and assumes that Moe is dying.

"He figures he will give Moe a great night with the little blue pill and a hooker. My character is totally reluctant to get involved because of his loyalty to the memory of his wife and the anxiety that comes along with sexual performance. A great deal of the comedy is Charley persuading my character that life goes on, and to enjoy it."

Cutell is also the co-author of Viagara Falls, and directed this production, which previously ran at Stage West in Calgary.

Bernie Kopell

"I love working with Lou. We are symbiotic – we feed off each other," says Kopell. "Between us there are 110 years of working in comedy, so we know what we are doing and we get a lot of laughs.

"Lou wrote the play and he's Italian, not Jewish, but Italians and Jews are so similar, almost the same temperament. I love this quote – 'I love Jews so much I had them for parents.' I stole it from Milton Berle."

"Basically, my rhythms are Jewish rhythms because I happen to be Jewish, and the first joke I ever heard was from my grandfather and it was in Yiddish. I have all these Yiddishisms," Kopell says. "I often call upon my friend, singer Ed Ames, who is a Jewish scholar, when I come upon a certain Yiddish word. Although my first five years in showbiz was playing Puerto Ricans and Cubans, because I discovered that I could do these accents, and that really got me going on this magic carpet ride."

After each performance, the cast comes out into the audience for a meet and greet. Kopell says that meeting the audience adds a personal touch that may get people to talk to their friends about the show. After all, he jokes, it is all about getting people in the seats!

Kopell also starred as Siegfried in Get Smart and as Jerry on That Girl. He is married to producer-actress Catrina Honadle. The couple has two sons – Adam, 12, and Joshua, 7. Adam was born when Kopell was 64 years old. They live in Tarzana, Calif.

Need a Housekeeper?

Jews, Muslims live in harmony in one Paris neighbourhood

By ILAN MOSS
JTA

PARIS — It's a few hours before Shabbat in the Belleville neighbourhood of Paris, and a Lubavitch Chassid is helping an elderly Tunisian Jew put on tfillin in the doorway of a kosher butchery.

Across the street, bearded Muslim vendors are hawking sweets and pastries to crowds of North African immigrants for the nightly Ramadan breakfast meal, called the iftar.

"Jews, Arabs and Berbers live in Belleville like they did in North Africa," Boussad says. "They have the same culture."

Despite the tensions that have marked Muslim-Jewish ties in France in recent years, this neighbourhood in northeastern Paris has managed to stay relatively free of them. The Arab-Israeli conflict still complicates relations between the two communities, but residents describe Belleville as idyllic compared to the hostility between Jews and Muslims in the immigrant suburbs surrounding Paris.

"A whole generation here has worked, lived and grown up together," says Serge Cohen, who runs a kosher bakery off the boulevard. "It's a different situation in the suburbs. Jews are separated from Muslims and they mistrust each other."

"You journalists only want to write about anti-Semitism," shouts a butcher at Henrino's kosher butchery on the Boulevard de Belleville. "We all get along here."

Some 350,000 Jews live in the Paris metropolitan area. In Belleville, the North African heritage shared by most French Jews is overt, which may help explain why Jews and Muslims here get along. Most Jewish residents and workers here are of Tunisian descent, and the neighbourhood is affectionately known as La Goulette on Seine – named after a coastal town on the Mediterranean.

"Tunisians are the most open-minded Jews, they are basically like us," says a Muslim customer at Soltane, a Belleville halal butchery.

Like the Jews from Algeria and Morocco, Tunisian Jews lived side by side with Arabs for centuries, sharing common food, language and music. Following the dissolution of the French colonial empire in the 1950s and 1960s, North African Jews and Muslims flocked to the urban hills of northern Paris. Many Tunisian Jews settled in Belleville, replacing an older Polish Jewish community.

On a typical Sunday on the grimy side streets off the Boulevard de Belleville, old men drink mint tea and argue in Arabic outside cafes adorned with photos of the late Lubavitcher rebbe, Menachem Mendel Schneerson, while restaurants feature live bands with Arab musicians playing for enthusiastic Jewish dancers.

"The older Jews feel at home in Belleville because it reminds them of Tunisia, where Jews and Arabs interacted daily," says Laurent Allouche, director of a Jewish funeral home. "But northeast Paris is the only place where this exists."

Belleville has not always been peaceful. Significant clashes between Tunisian Jews and Arabs broke out here following the 1967 Six-Day War, and again in 1973, during the Yom Kippur War.

Last summer, tensions ran high in the district neighbouring Belleville, Paris' 19th arrondissement, when street fights between youth gangs culminated in the savage beating of a 17-year-old Jew, Rudy Haddad. And many French Jews remain shaken by the kidnapping, torture and murder of a 23-year-old Jew, Ilan Halimi, in 2006.

This summer, 14 of the 27 gang members responsible for Halimi's death were convicted of abetting his murder.

Some Jews, however, say Halimi's death had less to do with anti-Semitism than gang and class warfare.

"It could have been anyone," the butcher at Henrino's says. "Even this guy," he says, grabbing his Sri Lankan assistant as his workers, slicing spicy merguez sausages, look on. "Or it could have been someone named Mohammed."

About half a mile uphill, in the Menilmontant district, Kamel Amriou says more needs to be done to make sure Jews and Muslims in Paris get along. Born in Paris to Algerian Muslims, he grew up in a building with plenty of Jewish North Africans.

Amriou now runs a successful printing business – with a Jewish partner – and has political aspirations. He wants to launch a political party that reflects the multicultural character of northern Paris.

While France officialdom holds that successful integration can take place only if minorities renounce their ethnic factionalism, pejoratively known as communautarisme, Amriou thinks the U.S. model would work better.

"America offers the most lasting model of integration in that communities keep their customs while respecting the other," Amriou says. "I want to create a movement inspired by my neighbourhood, where Jews and Arabs coexist but maintain their own traditions and religions."

Annie Paule Derczansky, director of a grass-roots organization called Peace Builders, is working to deepen coexistence by organizing meetings between Jewish and Arab women from the neighbourhood. This summer she held a halal/kosher picnic with some 150 local Jews and Arabs in the Butte Chaumont, a hot spot for intercommunal violence in 2008.

"We held the picnic without any police security," she says. "Observant Jews and Muslims attended, mingled and enjoyed kosher ice cream and cotton candy – served by Muslim vendors in the park."

Back in La Goulette, it remains to be seen if the next generation will continue the tradition of coexistence practiced by their ancestors.

Sitting in his funeral home with Rabbi Yehuda Gour Arie, a local Torah scribe and mohel, Allouche reflects on Belleville's future.

"The neighbourhood is changing," he says. "Up until the early 1990s there were more than 200 Jewish-owned businesses. Today there are only about 15."

Outside, Arielle, 19, stands with some friends.

"I grew up here and went to school at Ozar Hatorah down the street," she says. "I have plenty of Arab friends. We share many of the same traditions, which are passed down from previous generations. That is the most important thing in Belleville."

Israeli Grant returns to Premier League with Portsmouth

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

TEL AVIV — Israeli Avram Grant has returned to Portsmouth as director of soccer, the struggling English Premier League club said last week.

The 54-year-old, who replaced Jose Mourinho as Chelsea manager in September 2007 before being sacked the following May, was technical director at Portsmouth from June 2006 to July 2007.

Grant's return to Portsmouth followed its takeover this month by Saudi Arabian businessman Ali al Faraj, which is expected to stabilize the club's difficult financial position. He bought 90 per cent of the club's shares from Sulaiman al Fahim, who took over in August but was struggling to refinance the mounting debts. Paul Hart will remain as coach.

"The club's new owners want to appoint, with immediate effect, Avram Grant as director of football," chief executive Peter Storrie said on the club's website.

"Avram's role is to help and advise Paul. Team selection matters will remain with the [coach]. We now have two very experienced people working together, which will only benefit the club."

Grant's experience will be vital as Portsmouth try to make up ground after losing its opening seven league games of the season, the worst start by any top-flight side for 79 years.

"I am happy to return to the best league in the world, the English league," Grant told the Israeli sports website One, adding that he had signed a three-year contract.

Avram Grant

"My goal was to stay in the British soccer league and that is what I've done," he said. "It's now time for more work and less talk."

David James, Portsmouth's goalkeeper, yesterday backed Grant's appointment. "I love Avram, he's a great guy," he told British reporters. "When I first joined the club, he was there and he was very active in preparation for matches. He's a very wise man. His football knowledge is immense. It's a very good move."

The club, known as Pompey, is still at the bottom despite earning its first points of the season with a 1-0 win over Wolverhampton Wanderers on Oct. 10. It will be next in action against Tottenham Hotspur after the international break, and Grant is slated to return to Chelsea's Stamford Bridge in mid-December.

Storrie dispelled rumors that Grant's entry meant coach Hart's imminent departure. "Paul is going nowhere," he said. "He has done a tremendous job throughout and been an absolute brick," Storrie told British paper the News.

Among Pompey's players is Tal Ben Haim, who will get reacquainted with the man who coached him at Maccabi Tel Aviv, on the Israeli national team and at Chelsea. The two got into a dispute at Chelsea after the player said, "Had I known Grant would sign here I wouldn't have come." Ben Haim ended up on the bench.

Although his agent Pini Zahavi said yesterday that there's nothing to worry about, associates close to Ben Haim expressed surprise at Grant's appointment.

The two were joined by Jibril Rajoub, head of the Palestinian Football Association. The day after meeting Israel's President Shimon Peres, Platini took a few kicks on a Palestinian soccer field and paid his respects at the grave of former PA president Yasser Arafat.

Inside Back

My strict diet

NEW TO CANADA
By NINA SHENHAV

If you ask me, I keep kosher. I mean, I don't touch bacon, shrimp or any other amazing – so I'm told – seafood. And I don't mix milk with meat.

In Israel, most of my friends struggled with my behaviour, saying it didn't go well with my open, impish personality (don't get me started about the silent treatment I used to get after kissing a mezuzah passionately).

Here in Canada, I'm not off the hook, either. True, I have a few religious friends, but I'm an enigma among my secular ones. Still, they don't bug me about kashrut.

As for my non-Jewish friends, I'm not telling them about my kosher thing. They wouldn't understand, even if they took an interest, which they don't, anyway.

The day before yesterday, I was invited to my friend Christy's birthday party. (As her name suggests, her mother didn't speak Hebrew.) I went to a very posh, expensive restaurant, kissed Christy and sat down excitedly next to a couple of new people at the table. A polite, yet icy, waiter – he had a foreign accent. Was it French? – put a plate of shrimp (and their close relatives) in front of each of us.

Everybody started devouring the appetizers, while I just played with the pink stuff on my plate. I got some puzzled stares, but I held my ground bravely.

The waiter took my full plate without saying a word, but oh, if looks could kill.

The main course arrived: crispy pork ribs on mashed yam with butter and some parmesan cheese on top. People let out cries of joy. (I faked a few yelps myself, but nobody really bought it, let alone talked to me. They all started to hate me.)

I could sense the bad vibrations, when Christy couldn't resist and shouted over the table: "Nina, is something wrong with your food?" (It's her party, and she'll cry if she wants to.)

"Oh," I mumbled. "No, it's great, it's just that… I'm more of a… of a chicken eater."

In a heartbeat, a plate with a nice roasted chicken appeared in front of me, all festive with it's béchamel and butter sauce. I fended it off gently, but there was nothing gentle about Christy's eyes.

The aura became more and more hostile, so I said to myself: "What the heck. I keep kosher and that's that. And as far as I'm concerned, let the gentiles hate me!"

I got up, cleared my throat, and declared: "I keep… I keep a strict diet."

My last words were drowned in sighs of relief. Even the waiter was looking the other way. Everybody examined my behind and my front (some men more than necessary), and the atmosphere became pleasant again. I had somehow finally managed to reject chicken with yogurt when the waiter announced what was available for dessert: whipped cream cakes with meringue, cheese and strawberries, éclairs, chocolate cakes with black and white sauces – you name it.

And I named it, but got nothing.

"We'll keep an eye on you," promised Christy. "We won't let you fail."

She took the creams away from me.

"Keep strong," whispered the waiter, putting an icy hand on my shivering shoulder. "I'm making you a special freshly cut apple from the kitchen. Kosher," he added.

That last sentence, by the way, was spoken in Hebrew.

Strength training helps women over 50

FITNESS CORNER
By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

I've said it before: strength training has many advantages for women, particularly those aged 35 and older.

Women generally begin to lose bone density and muscle mass by age 40. A study done at Tufts University found that woman 50 and older who weight train with light free weights twice a week for a year regained bone density. In fact, weight training can actually make your body feel up to 20 years younger in just one year.

Strength training is essential to overall health and wellness, but it's often overlooked in favour of cardiovascular-based workouts. Cardiovascular-based workouts are an important component of fitness, but they only strengthens the heart and lungs. Strength training produces muscle mass, which in turn improves metabolic rate, increases bone density and stabilizes joints. More muscle mass means a more efficient metabolism, which is essential for maintaining healthy body weight.

Simple activities such as getting out of a chair or walking up a flight of stairs start to get hard as we age because of the loss of muscle mass in the legs and core. This process actually creates muscle imbalances throughout the body, causing backaches, sore legs, joint problems, headaches and eventually the loss of balance. Tufts researchers found that the women in their study not only regained bone density, but their strength tests matched women who were in their 30s and 40s.

Strength training is the only known effective method in preventing osteoporosis. Weight training and other types of strength training can improve quality of life and the ability to complete daily tasks for adults even in their 80s and 90s.

So whether you're into health clubs, working out with a trainer or home-based workouts, it's important to find an activity you like, then devise a fitness program around it. Exercise doesn't have to hurt. It can be fun!

Oh yeah – don't forget to stretch.

Israel and the Philippines

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

The recent natural disasters in the Philippines showed no sympathy for their victims. Hundreds of people are dead. Millions were displaced.

While the odious Typhoon Parma rained down and greedily swept away children, I kept thinking about the two Filipino women who take care of my aunt. She is 92 and has around-the-clock care. Both lovely women tend to her as if they were her family. They call her aunt. They have even spent nights with her in the hospital. One of them regularly reminds me to visit my aunt more often.

When the rains came to this southeast Asian country, whipped up by some exogenous source, I remembered the two diminutive but strong men who took care of Marcus, my mother's husband, when he was dying. I recalled how they would gently pick him up and try to find a comfortable position for him. I can envision, too, the tears streaming down their faces when he died, and their presence at his memorial.

As the brutal and deadly waters whooshed into Philippine neighbourhoods creating a state of calamity, I felt a strong affinity with the 100,000 Filipinos living in Toronto and a need for our community to appreciate the goodness they have bestowed upon us.

The Filipino people are suffering and we must consider the sensitive tasks we ask them to perform and how well they often succeed. How many of us have benefited from the compassionate nannies and senior caregivers who have coddled and tended to our greatest treasures – our children and our parents?

At the same time, we also need to be aware of the support the Philippines have given the State of Israel and the Jewish People.

In 1947, the Philippines voted in favour of UN Resolution 181, a partition plan for Palestinian Arabs and Israel. In 2006, when Israel defended itself against Hezbollah in southern Lebanon, the Philippine government refused to condemn Israel at the UN Human Rights Council table. The Philippines also declined to condemn Israel during the war in Gaza last winter.

Between 1935 and 1946, the Commonwealth of the Philippines allowed for the immigration of Jews escaping Nazi Germany. The Embassy of the Republic of the Philippines in the State of Israel website, www.philembtelaviv.co.il, indicates that Manuel L. Quezon, president of the country at that time, made 10,000 visas available for eastern European Jews to travel to his country.

"To reinforce this open door policy, President Quezon built a housing community for Jewish refugees in Marikina in 1939, and allotted a farm and large settlement area in Mindanao for Jewish refugees before the outbreak of World War II," the website says.

The people of the Philippines are suffering, and it is paramount that we heed their cries. Israel is, of course, in the forefront of rescue and assistance there. The UJA Federation of Greater Toronto (www.ujafed.org) as well as Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee (www.vehavta.org) have launched crisis responses to help those affected by the typhoon.

Consider the many positive things the Toronto Filipino community has given our people. Mull over the Philippines' support of Israel, and then lend a hand to fix whatever we can in a country soaking wet with pain from winds and rains that came, and left great misery behind.

Handmade chupah is a labour of love

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

The chupah, a fundamental part of a Jewish wedding, is basically a canopy that sits on top of four poles. The word literally means covering or protection, and symbolizes the groom's home and the bride's new domain.

The posts that hold up the canopy signify trust and faith on which a marriage must stand; and the chupah is a reminder to the bride and groom that they are entering a covenant with each other.

So when Gillian and Jordan were planning their wedding, Gillian wanted her mom – who lives more than 3,000 kilometres away from her – to be part of the planning of the wedding. So she asked her to make the wedding canopy.

"It was hard to find a way to include my mom in the planning because of the distance, and this gave her something to do to feel that she was a part of it and to keep a link with her during the lead up to the wedding," said Gillian.

Gillian's mom, an ardent seamstress, knitter and quilter, was pleased when presented with this request.

"I felt it was really something I could do to be part of their wedding plans, as they were both so organized and I didn't know what I was supposed to do, if anything," she said.

She promptly started doing research on the Internet and at the library for patterns and corresponded with Jordan's mom, and within two weeks came up with just what she wanted to do. She then planned the canopy. It couldn't be too complicated a quilting pattern, as she had less than a year to complete it.

"I wanted it to be something that embraced both families, telling a story about the lives of the bride and groom," she said, "and I thought a lot about Gillian and Jordan building their life together, and remembered a pattern I had always wanted to try called building blocks."

She chose unbleached cotton (to represent the sandy beach on which the couple would exchange their vows), and since the wedding colours were cream, gold and green, she used the three colours for the border pattern of building blocks.

It took three diamond shapes to make one building block, so 180 pieces of each colour were needed. She cut out 540 diamond shapes and stitched them together; and 25, 10-inch squares of the cotton fabric. On 12 of the squares, she had pictures and drawings created by Gillian and Jordan lasered on, making sure that both were equally represented.

The other 13 squares were hand-quilted with different designs, including a double wedding band (representing the two families) for the centre square; a butterfly (Gillian loved them as a child); a guitar (Jordan used to be in a band and still plays once in a while); a lover's knot; Xs with hearts in the centre to represent hugs and kisses from both families; the date of the marriage; and the design used for Gillian's engagement ring.

Gillian's parents display the handmade chupah.

"And the great thing about this building block pattern is that if you study it further, six-point stars also appear," she added.

She sewed pieces of fabric that are germane to Gillian's and Jordan's respective histories throughout the border pattern: a small piece from the baby blanket Gillian was wrapped in when she came home from the hospital; a pocket from the jeans Gillian used to love to wear; a strip of ribbon that was around the first gift Jordan gave his in-laws; and black fabric to symbolize his goth period of fashion.

The chupah, which took eight months to complete, was truly a labour of love, and Gillian said that she was touched by what her mom had made for her and Jordan.

"It gave me a lump in my throat because she was so nervous putting it together, as it was really important to her," said Gillian, "and that made it more special for me."

"It's slung over the back of the rocking chair that mom used to rock me to sleep in and which is now in our living room," said Gillian, "and we'll use it to stay warm and snuggled up together."

What nobody told me about being married

By NATALIE DAVIDSON
Special to The CJN

After months of planning, waiting and being excited, our wedding day came and went faster than I could have imagined. I now have a giant pile of pictures, a long DVD, a huge box filled with my dress, and a bag filled with cards to show me what I missed that day.

After waking up the next morning, I didn't even believe that it happened. It all felt like a dream. And then it hit me… I'm married, a wife…. What do I do now?

When people find out you are engaged they wish you mazel tov and congratulations. Instead, they should give you a piece of advice. Nobody tells you how much of an adjustment and a learning experience marriage really is.

We've been together for 2,892 days, and just celebrated our first anniversary. How is this possible you wonder? Well, when you get married, nobody tells you that all the other years you've been together get erased and only your wedding anniversary counts.

Nobody tells you that when you tell people you've been married for one year everyone makes a big deal about being a newlywed, and then comes the inevitable question. Nobody tells you that every day someone asks: "So when are you having children?" and nobody tells you how to respond. I've gotten very good at responding. At first I used to say, "Never." Then I went on to say, "After everyone stops asking." Now I have the perfect response. I say nothing at all. I act as if they never even asked and move on.

Natalie, Brett and their dog David

Nobody tells you how to choose your fights wisely and how to let things that don't matter so much slide. There's no point in fighting over what you are going to eat for dinner that night. Nobody tells you that when 6:30 comes, there's no one to cook dinner for you, and after cooking dinner, there are dishes.

Nobody tells you that if you leave those dishes in the sink (which is what I did when I lived with my parents), they don't magically disappear like they used to. If you decide to put those dishes in the dishwasher, be sure to use special dishwasher soap unless you want a flood of bubbles on your kitchen floor. Nobody tells you that regular liquid soap is not allowed to be put in the dishwasher. There are a lot of things that I'm still learning as I go along.

I sometimes wish that someone would have told me a bit of advice on being married. I often wonder if they didn't tell me because they believed that all of this information was common sense and everyone knows it, or if they hid it because they were worried I would be scared off. Either way, each and every one of our 456 days of marriage has been incredible, and I wouldn't have it any other way. I just hope that in our next 100 years together we figure it all out.

May we meet and recognize our basherts

By FREIDELE GALYA SOBAN BINIASHVILI
Special to The CJN

When my rabbi called me to suggest fixing me up with the man who would become my husband, I reluctantly agreed.

From his description, he did not sound like someone I was looking for. I reminded myself, though, of a friend's constant advice to me, that with each suggested shidduch, I was one step closer to meeting my true bashert.

Our first date was a Saturday night and needless to say, my husband-to-be and I had a wonderful time. We realized we had a lot in common, and before long things between us quickly progressed. Although it took many years to find each other, in the end, it felt as if it happened in almost an instant. I went from worrying about still being single to worrying about planning a wedding.

Picking the date was the first big decision to make. The ideal time that we were looking at coincided with my sister's expected delivery date. Added to the mix were three weeks of mourning during which no weddings can take place, as well as my future nephew's bar mitzvah, followed by Rosh Hashanah closely on its heels. Eventually, my rabbi's wife gave us the sound advice to just pick the date that was good for the wedding and HaShem would take care of the rest.

So, with that in mind, the date was picked for one week after my sister's due date. While my sister assured me that she would be at the wedding, I only prayed that somehow she would, but that she wouldn't be wearing a hospital gown. Indeed, however, she did deliver (pardon the pun) on her promise, adding one more guest to the women's section eight days before the wedding. Luckily, this guest would be bringing her own meal.

On the day of the wedding, we were fortunate to have beautiful weather, as our chupah was outside. I was truly amazed at how everything seemed to come together, including, much to my surprise, the arrival of an entire busload of boys from the yeshiva where my husband davens who came to join in the celebrating and dancing.

I feel very blessed to have met my husband. It is said that making a shidduch is as difficult as parting the Red Sea. One explanation for this is that the sea did not recognize that the people standing before them were the beloved children of Israel.

I understand this on a much deeper level now, recognizing that HaShem gave me a beautiful gift, but it came in an entirely different wrapping paper than the one I had imagined it would. On that note, may all who are still looking for their basherts not only meet them soon but also recognize them as such when they do, and as a result, may we all continue to share in many more simchahs.

Breaking the glass.

Honeymoon trips with a twist

By ANITA SZABADI-GOTTESMAN
Special to The CJN

If you've ever thought about climbing K2 (the second-highest mountain on Earth), or learning how to scuba dive while hunting for sunken ships, or sky diving, why not choose to fulfil a dream or two as you honeymoon?

While many of us would prefer to cruise the seas of the Caribbean or lie on the beach at an all-inclusive resort, more and more newlyweds are choosing an adventure-based or educationally themed honeymoon.

Camping has become a choice honeymoon activity for more and more couples. Hiking in the Canadian Rockies or in the Grand Canyon is a favourite. Vermont's famed Long Trail is a short drive away from Montreal. Most parks provide cabins along the many trails, for couples who want a little more luxury than a tent. Cooking together over an open fire, hiking or spotting birds or animals can be an active, interesting way to honeymoon after the wedding day

There are lots of honeymoon options.

Newlyweds looking to experience something a little different can choose to visit and explore a UNESCO World Heritage site. Exploring a far-flung destination is not only romantic but educational as well. UNESCO defines a World Heritage site as one that deserves to be preserved as part of the rich heritage of humankind. There are more than 700 UNESCO sites across 129 countries. How about exploring the volcanoes and glaciers of Kamchatka, Russia? Or a heritage site not far from home in Lunenburg, N.S., that is defined as the best surviving example of British colonial settlement dating back to 1753? For a complete list, check UNESCO's website: whc.unesco.org.

Ecotourism has seen unprecedented popularity as the world's ecological concerns grow. Join a scientific tour of the Galapagos Islands to see and study the unique animals of the islands in their natural habitat. Or try a Zodiac whale tour off the coast of Newfoundland.

For exercise and enjoyment, what could be more romantic than bicycling through the vineyards of France? Accompanying a group of cyclists with a guide or heading out as a couple and staying at bed and breakfasts along the way can create just the right amount of romance and adventure. You can also celebrate together while you learn to master a new skill such as golf or tennis, or work toward certification as a sailor or scuba diver.

Organized volunteering trips to underprivileged or other areas of the globe to participate in helping activities are gaining popularity. Habitat for Humanity and other organizations build homes for those in need in places as close as New Orleans, Louisiana. Or you could spend a few weeks together in Israel touring and volunteering for the Israel Defence Forces.

If all these honeymoon options are too daunting to consider, what about just honeymooning at home? Turn off the cellphones, don't check e-mails or phone messages and explore your hometown – together. Do the things you have always wanted to do but never found the time for. Hire a personal chef to cook a few romantic meals, rent some movies and enjoy some down time after the excitement and exhaustion of the wedding.

Travel tips

Keep safe. Stay healthy. These form the foundation of a great trip. Protecting your family when you travel is a priority, especially during a year with the threat of H1N1 (swine flu). These simple tips from the travel resource website, Savvy Traveller, can help you prepare for the unexpected.

Ask your doctor about vaccinations you may need before you go and remember to refill any prescriptions you need to take with you.

Look out for travel advisories and look up your destination's government website to see if there are any health (or other) advisories for the area you're travelling to.

The website www.savvytraveller.ca offers many helpful links, including one to the Foreign and International Trade Canada website for travellers.

Get protection – travel insurance can not only take care of expensive medical treatment costs but it can also provide you with resources, such as the location of a good doctor and assistance with lost bags and cancelled flights. Look for travel insurance plans, such as Travel Guard's, which offers a toll-free number to reach live help 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

Plan ahead – put essential phone numbers and contacts in one place, then give a copy to a family member or good friend at home. You can download important information and phone numbers from www.savvytraveller.ca.

Know where to go – make note of the phone number and address of the Canadian Embassy or consulate at your destination in case you lose your passport.

Involve family in your plans

By NETALY STETTER BRAND
Special to The CJN

It's over! After 10 months of planning, family tension, personal conflicts, tears, happiness, joy and sadness, it's all over; I can't believe it!

Many people say that planning a wedding is something little girls have done since they were little. To some that may be true, but for me, it was a whole new world. I loved doing it, but I'm also glad it is over because of the tension and stress that weddings also cause.

Now that it is all said and done, I have learned some valuable things.

First, do speak up about both your expectations during this time of planning, as many people who are involved (from the bridal party to mothers to mothers-in-law) may have their own personal expectations about what your wedding means to them. So talk about it to make sure everyone is on the same page prior to the major planning.

Netaly and David Brand

Ask who wants to be involved with what, and figure out what you're willing to compromise on for your parents or in-laws. Personally, I liked to be involved in all parts of the planning (even my shower), but there were some aspects where I did not care what the final outcome was, so know what you're lenient on; give out some small tasks to make people feel involved.

> Enjoy your special day

Second, family conflict will eventually occur. Speak about those money issues earlier rather than later. With whatever other conflict occurs, what matters is if the bride and groom are like a part of one world. Keep your family in the loop with new developments, because that will make them feel more involved. Don't say "no" immediately to their ideas, say, "Maybe. I'll think about it," to keep them happy and to acknowledge that they've been heard.

Bedeken ceremony

Netaly and David Brand kiss.

And third, no matter what happens, it doesn't matter. Things may go off schedule, someone may step on your dress, you may forget your entire speech, but at the end of the day, you get to face your partner and know this is your husband or wife.

The day will fly by, so take advantage of every second. Take pictures, smile and breathe! It's your special day and you want to remember having fun and capturing the moments in your heart and mind. So dance, eat and be merry, because believe it or not, now you're married!

A chance meeting at a mall

By RONDA PINSKY-HECKER
Special to The CJN

It was a Monday evening in March, 2000. A friend and I were having supper at Max's restaurant in Bayview Village. A suited gentleman with a paper under his arm sat down beside us.

My friend and I chatted while the gentleman read his paper and ate his chicken salad. (We still wonder was I eating tongue or liver?)

My friend kept saying to me "I know that man."

This went on for 20 minutes, until finally I said, "If you think you know him, find out."

She said, "Excuse me, I think I know you," and they figured out that she had met him at a singles dance some time earlier.

When we exchanged names, I said, "Oh, do you know so and so?" and he replied, "Yes, that's my brother and sister-in-law."

I had known them for years. Actually they had been at the wedding of one of my daughters. Eventually he left, and we continued to dine. I thought he might be interested in my friend, never thinking he was interested in me.

When he arrived home, he called his sister-in-law, who didn't have my number. She gave him another number, they gave him my niece's number, and my nephew gave him mine. (My nephew later thought it might not have been a good idea to give it to him without checking with me, but I assured him it was OK.)

He called. He asked me out, and the rest is history.

There's an interesting aside to this story: sometime before we met, he had come to the same mall. As he walked in, he saw a woman standing in the doorway of an apparel store talking to someone in a business-like manner. He thought to himself, "I'd like to meet a woman like that. Oh well, she's probably married." There's a real possibility it could have been me that he saw, as I had worked in that store and at that time worked for the same company at another location and went back and forth for business. Was it me? Who knows?

We've been together all these years and we married on Jan. 18, 2009. Our wedding was in my daughter's home with all our wonderful children and grandchildren around us. It was very special. Life is sweet.

A wonderful experience

By MIRIAM BERGART

Our paths first crossed at the off-leash dog park
We exchanged a hello, our dogs, a bark.

Fast forward to June two-thousand-and-eight

A surprising proposal in a riad in Fes,
The ring stored in his puffer "for safe transport," he says.

I gleefully accept, without second thought,
Through mountains and desert we start up our plot.

I say, "How 'bout city hall? It's simple and cheap!"
But he would not hear it: tradition we'd keep.

On May thirty-first, two-thousand-and-nine
We held each other's hand, walked down the straight line.

The sun beat down and the tent above creaked
Through the brachot and grape juice our excitement then peaked.

When down came his foot, smashing the glass,
The kiss and high-five both followed with class.

The hora was one we will never forget
'Twas the best one I've seen in all my years yet.

With a napkin to link us, thrust high in the chairs
Rabbi wheelbarrowed through, his feet up in the air.

We copied his move, have the shoe print to prove it,
We danced till we sweated; the groom did the worm groove!

My Zaidy of ninety was a ball of fire.
He kept his feet moving with no signs of tiring.

My dad performed Leonard, the other Cohen in the room,
A hit that brought laughter to both bride and groom.

A wonderful night to kick start a new life

I knew what I wanted

By MICHELLE GINZ
Special to The CJN

I'm the type of girl who had always dreamt about her wedding day. I had a vision of how I would look and feel, how the décor would be set up and how the night would play out. I just needed the man!

Early on in my relationship with Dan, I knew he was the one I wanted to marry. But after about 2-1/2 years of dating and no ring, I began to get anxious. All I could think about for the next year was our future wedding. I had it on the brain.

Finally, on Sept. 26, 2008, he got down on one knee and asked me to become his wife. Of course, I said yes. Then I started jumping up and down, and hugged him while jumping up and down. Then I called my family.

The minute all the announcement calls were made, my mind immediately shifted into wedding-planning mode.

Dan and Michelle.

Within the first week, I had already booked the synagogue, and the band, and I had an appointment to meet with a wedding planner. Once I met with her, she gave me a list of who's who in the wedding world and my schedule became consumed with wedding planning. Because I knew exactly what I wanted, my fiancé and I, along with our parents, planned the wedding within a couple of months.

Of course, throughout the past year, we've made some changes, and there are smaller tasks that still need to be done, but mostly it has been a waiting game.

I have less than two weeks left until my wedding day, but through all my meticulous planning, I have learned that it's only the beginning of my life with Dan. And no matter what happens with the décor, the seating plan or the food on the big day, it will be the wedding I have always dreamed of, because of the loving, intelligent and handsome man that I have chosen to spend my life with.

Reclaiming your shiny crowning glory

News Canada

Ultra-glossy hair is a hallmark of youth. Dry, damaged frizz, not so much. But don't fret if your hair is fast-forwarding your face. Reclaiming your shiny crowning glory is easy and affordable at Salon Salle de Bain — yes, your bathroom. Here are some ways to save your hair.

• Colour with a semi-permanent home colour. Semi-permanent dye is ammonia-free; rather than penetrating the cuticle, it coats the surface to leave hair smoother, shinier, stronger and a little thicker.

Try an enriched semi-permanent formula like Clairol Natural Instincts, which contains antioxidants and vitamins C and E to boost hair's health. Using it every four to six weeks will reinforce conditioning and amp up healthy-looking shine. Bonus: this type of colour gradually fades in about 28 shampoos, so you won't get obvious roots.

• Use the Clairol Natural Instincts' enclosed deep conditioner as an intense weekly moisturizing treatment. Apply the treatment, cover hair with plastic wrap and leave on for 30 minutes before rinsing.

• Regularly use a moisturizing shampoo, conditioner and leave-in treatment to reduce frizz and maintain hair's health between colour jobs. Pantene Pro-V NatureFusion Smooth Vitality contains a blend of avocado, bamboo and grapeseed extracts, as well as cassia, a herb that helps restore hair's radiance and makes it up to four times stronger against damage.

• Always rinse with cool water to smooth the hair shaft for a shiny finish. Instead of a brush, which can cause breakage on wet or damp hair, use a wide-tooth comb.

• Allow hair to dry naturally whenever possible. Reduced use of heat-styling tools helps maintain hair's overall vitality.

Thoughts that lead to a happy ending

By TAMMY BENLOLO and ARI GILARY
Special to The CJN

Every little girl dreams of her wedding day. I know this, because it's the only thing I've heard for the past five years. Such is my life dating a beautiful Moroccan princess. I, on the other hand, come from a Polish background with a hint of Israeli, and this type of pressure makes my gefilte fish feel awfully fishy.

***

Twenty-six? 26? Sexy. Exciting. 26 is the magical number in my family. Both my mother and my sister married at 26 and so many of my friends. I was born on the 26th. Well I'm now 28, and all I want is to feel normal. I don't care if I'm happy with anything. I'm not a materialistic person. But now the price has gone up. Awesome! Now, every sparkling diamond looks better. Now it's 28.

***

The day I met Tammy, I knew I was going to marry her. I don't say that lightly. I don't believe in "love at first sight." So it's finally got the ring. Now all I have to do is convince her to marry me. Some might say I have the easy part. They wouldn't be wrong.

***

His birthday is here, and like any great Moroccan woman, I planned a feast of all his favourite meals for the day. Usually the [illegible] is meant to be homage. But as she's spending the weekend in Jamaica (alone), [illegible]

How sweet. He wants to watch the sunset down by the water. He's such a romantic, he even set some candles by the dock.

***

She looks so beautiful sitting by the water with the sun setting on her face. It's almost angelic. I'll remember this minute forever.

***

He is way too cute now – he wrote a poem for me on his birthday! Awww.

***

till she sees the grand finale.

***

Gee, for a self-proclaimed guy's guy he sure is getting choked up. I've never seen him so emotional. Am I heartless because I'm not crying too? Wait a second, what is he doing?

***

"You are the truth behind every preaching of love
Every happily ever after,
The true meaning of a soulmate.
When love is spoken, you are of what they speak.
Tammy, will you bless my life with yours … and marry me?"

***

Oh my God! Is this really happening? Is this real? What is he doing? Oh my, God! That's a big ring!

***

***

Yes.

***

Finally … now I can breathe again, and embrace my fiancee. I guess she liked the ring.

What a breathtaking interruption. "Forever isn't long enough." And the diamond is to die for! But I am! Aside! I just said yes to [illegible]

Bridal bliss across the generations

Kim and Allan Friedman surrounded by their blended family.

By ALLAN FRIEDMAN
Special to The CJN

It was supposed to be about the details…

We organized the hall, the centrepieces and the food (oh, the food!). We arranged for the music, designed our own invitations and seating cards. We even burned a CD of our favourite songs for all of the guests, including the song I composed for my bride-to-be.

We created a guest list, set up an e-mail address for the replies and put together a "next-morning" breakfast, and gave my mother "permission" to throw the "night-before" dinner (as if we would have had a choice!). We ordered the cake and designed it to spec. It was a 3-1/2-by-2-1/2-foot baby ivory grand piano, complete with 88 keys – thank you, Richman's Bakery!

My father, who is Orthodox, was okay with our choice of rabbi and cantor, which surprised me a bit, because we were planning a Reform wedding. He said three words to me that put everything into perspective. He said, "You look happy." It was enough for him. It didn't matter what level of religion I embraced, or how many sets of dishes I would have. What mattered to him, at this point in his life and mine, was that I was truly happy.

We made a list and checked it twice, and were ready to go with still a few weeks remaining.

Then, the first blow. Kim's wedding dress was more than a month late. With less than six weeks until the wedding, she had yet to lay eyes on it. The dress finally showed up, approximately three weeks before the wedding, and it was horrible. Of course, that was Kim's opinion… I never saw it. (My mother agreed with her, however, for whatever that's worth.)

In a testament to Kim's world, where everything works out for the best, minutes after leaving the bridal store, she drove past a small bridal shop and, just on a whim, went in. Sure enough, she had a new dress. When I saw it at the wedding, there was no doubt that she had made the right decision (and once again, my mother agreed).

Life resumed its normal countdown… three weeks… two weeks… one week.

"Allan, something's wrong." Kim wasn't feeling well.

Six days before the wedding, Kim started losing muscle function, and it became increasingly painful for her to move. By Friday afternoon, with four days to go, the slightest movement was causing her extreme agony. Her mother made an early trip from Montreal. We discussed postponing the wedding, to which Kim replied, "I'm getting married even if I have to go down the aisle in a wheelchair!" You see why I love her so much.

Friday evening we called an ambulance to take her to the hospital. It took about eight hours to run tests, get results, see doctors, etc. It was good for us, as funny as that sounds. We spent eight hours in a small cubicle, caring for and about each other. We connected on an even deeper level. It turned out that Kim had picked up a nasty viral strain of the flu that manifested itself into her musculature. They sent us home, with a prescription for pain meds and a "congratulations and good luck."

Miraculously by Sunday, she was a bit better. We were able to host a small dinner party at home for our out-of-town friends. Monday night was dinner at my parents, and by Tuesday afternoon, she was zipping up her own wedding dress.

The kids were fantastic. Helping, preparing, getting ready, helping each other, etc. Yeah, right. The truth is, there was absolute chaos in our home the day of the wedding. Yet somehow, all seven of us piled into the Mazda and drove to the hall on time. The ceremony was beautiful, as was Kim. The evening was an unmitigated success and a good time was had by all.

We left on our honeymoon a few days later – a 12-day Mediterranean cruise that took us to Italy, Turkey, Spain, Monaco and Greece, a "dream of a lifetime" trip for both of us. Now, we continue living our "dream of a lifetime" – me, Kim and our five incredible children. It just doesn't get any better than this.

Celebrating 62 years together

By MYRA KRANGLE
Special to The CJN

Let me set the stage. Myra and Daniel were married during the afternoon at Holy Blossom Temple by Rabbi Abraham Feinberg. It was a small wedding held in the chapel before an audience of family and friends. Afterward people made their way to the Royal York Hotel where the wedding dinner was held. After a lovely dinner, the young couple set off to their booked room at the King Edward Hotel, where they were to spend their first night together before leaving for a two-week honeymoon at Scaroon Manor in northeast United States.

It is important to understand the conditions that prevailed in Toronto at that time. This was post World War II, which ended in May 1945, and there were no hotel rooms to be had. Our reservations had been made well in advance, and we booked a room to be occupied after our wedding dinner.

Innocents that we were, around 9 p.m we entered the hotel, luggage in hand, expecting to be conducted to a beautiful bright room for our nuptial fulfilment. What a shock we had when we were asked to wait for a short time. About 30 minutes later, a porter took our luggage, and led us to our little love nest. But this was not to be. We entered a room that was completely littered with bottles and other offensive material, and smelled like someone had brought up his entire guts before we arrived.

In disgust, we returned to the front desk, frantically explaining our dilemma, and were told to wait a little longer. Eventually, the process was repeated... the porter arrived, luggage was taken, and off we went to our new room, expecting that our problems were over. But this was not to be. Again, we entered a room that looked like a drunken brawl had taken place and only the bodies had been removed: litter, cigarette butts and beer bottles lay all about, and a sickening odour filled the air.

The routine was repeated once again. Back to the front desk we went, attempts to soothe us were offered, and eventually a third room was found. This time we moved with our porter to a room which at least had a veneer of cleanliness, but lacked that romantic feeling all newlyweds expect.

It was now well past midnight, and the great sparks of love that we had long anticipated turned out to be a simmering fire that had to be postponed until Scaroon was at hand.

Don't go away... the story is not yet over. For our 50th anniversary on June 16, 1997, we renewed our marriage vows at Holy Blossom Temple, this time with Rabbi (Gunther) Plaut. We returned to the King Edward Hotel with our 1947 bill in hand. When we presented it to the desk clerk and he saw that it was only $7.10, he was flabbergasted. We had him stamp our bill with the current rate, which was $199. What a shock. One can only hope that for $199 the service has been substantially upgraded.

The bride and groom have now been together for 62 years. Most times it's wedded bliss, sometimes wedded blitz, but who can ask for anything more?

What a year!

By JENNIFER BRINDER
Special to The CJN

It's hard to believe 365 days has gone by since I walked down the aisle and married the love of my life. Sept. 21, 2008 was the best day of my life.

After all the hype and excitement, it was just the two of us. After the wedding, we had a few months to prepare and get organized before moving into our new home. Moving in to our new home was a huge step for the both of us, as we always lived with our families before the wedding.

We moved in, and due to my mindset of having to get everything done right away, we organized everything immediately. The house was completely livable after three days, with pictures hanging on the wall and the cable set up. Getting into a routine was a whole other story.

Getting up in the morning was never an easy task. We had to figure out who would shower first and how many times we could hit the snooze button before we would be late for work.

I also wanted to make sure I could organize my laundry so it could be done when I got home from work. Clothes Mountain, as good friends of ours like to call it. It's unreal! For two people, I sometimes believe we do laundry for an entire family.

I can say it definitely took a lot of time to get into a routine. It's just the three of us in the house – myself, my husband, David, and our dog, Taz.

After a while, everything was running smoothly, and we were generally having no problems with the house. Well, at least that's what I thought. The day before the first seder of Passover, I went to the basement to do laundry and saw that my basement floor was covered in water and toilet paper. I immediately called my husband. Actually, first I covered my face and screamed, and then I called my husband, who was working late that night. Luckily, we had the list of emergency numbers to call. I knew it would come in handy one day!

David, Taz and Jen.

David and Jen after one year.

An emergency company came to our house at 11 p.m. and told us exactly what we didn't want to hear: "Ma'am, you have a backup of sewage." How disgusting! It got cleared up the next day. The only good thing that came out of that situation is that we weren't having the first seder at our house!

The funniest thing about getting married is how often people ask when we are going to have kids. It's funny, because when we were dating, everyone asked when we were going to get engaged. As soon as we got engaged, everyone was waiting for the wedding. The day after the wedding, we were asked the question that we are now asked on a daily basis: "When are you guys going to have kids?"

Together through it all

At the end of the day, whether we have a sewage backup in our basement or mounds of laundry, we still have each other. And that's the best part of it all.

The Florida Keys offer a variety of travel options

News Canada

The post office in Key West, Fla., is designated Mile Marker 0, and from there by one road, it is 127 magnificent miles to the Miami turnpike.

Driving the other way, the mile markers (MM) descend all the way to Key West. Each one helps travellers to pinpoint their exact location – and that includes some of Florida's most unusual sites.

• MM 84: Robbie's Rent-A-Boat is more than a service for kayaks, houseboats and fishing tours. It's an entertaining landmark to stop for a snack, and indeed, to feed a snack to the constant gathering of wild tarpons beneath its docks, while you mingle with scores of equally curious and hungry pelicans.

• MM 79.8: Stop for fishing, eating and sleeping at Bud 'n Mary's in Islamorada, a world famous, Old Florida-style marina and motel of Hemingway style. What makes sport fishing here so supreme? The Florida Keys are in the path where the Atlantic Ocean, the Gulf of Mexico, the Florida Bay and the Everglades meet – and that makes no place on earth as abundant with saltwater fish.

• MM 61.1: On Duck Key, give yourself a treat by pulling off to spend a day or two on the sunny beach and in the arms of luxury at the newly refurbished, Hawk's Cay Resort (www.hawkscay.com). For the gracious hospitality of a bygone era, stop here also for exquisite dining, a full-service spa, the children's club, watersports, fishing and sailing, and one of the most educational dolphin encounters in the world.

• MM 33: A little further south, be sure to take time out for a kayak nature tour. Naturalists with Big Pine Kayak Adventures (www.keyskayaktours.com) will take you up close to seabirds, sea turtles and secret passages. If living free-and-easy like the locals is your style, then rent a one- or two-bedroom cottage here from The Old Wooden Bridge Fishing Camp. Information: www.old-woodenbridge.com.

Beach at Florida Keys.

• MM 0: Mother Nature insists that this 127-mile rainbow of islands must to come to an end, but we all know what that means. The Key West pot of gold magically combines the charm of its history and location with its own brand of kick-back hospitality. Everyone takes home a little or a lot of this spirit because it's so hard to leave it behind. Highlights here include Mallory Square at sunset, strolling Duval Street, a beer at Sloppy Joes, the Conch Tour Train, Mel Fisher Treasure Museum, plus unmatched dining, nightlife and entertainment. More on this at www.keywestattractions.org.

• MM 0: Not only is the award-winning Southernmost Hotel Collection (three nearby properties on a splendid beach in Key West) a breathtaking location for romance and for families, it's also price conscious. With three swimming pools, two pool bars, a fitness centre, beach activities, swaying hammocks – and the most direct line south to Cuba – guests are spared the add-on costs common at other resorts. Parking, Internet Wi-Fi, a fitness centre, beach chairs and more are all complimentary. Information: www.southernmostcollection.com.

• MM 0: Hop on a bicycle. This town holds many surprises, but you have to know where to look. The personal guides with Lloyds Tropical Bike Tour take you on discoveries in quiet and pretty residential neighbourhoods. Along the way, with the exotic scents of jasmine and gardenias, you get to sample wild mangoes, coconuts, starfruit, key limes and more. On this tour, there's no fuel, no fumes, no noise, and a sense of true pleasure reconfirms why you came to Key West in the first place.

Bridal guide focuses on destination weddings

By ELAINE COHEN
Special to The CJN

Boring ceremonies and cookie- cutter wedding receptions don't interest Alison Hotchkiss, author of Destination Wedding Planner: The Ultimate Guide to Planning a Wedding from Afar

Hotchkiss looks outside the box. At the outset, she implies pre-millennium-style weddings went out with the VHS and Sixteen Candles. No doubt, many modern brides will share the author's sentiments, but even traditionalists may decide to plan a destination wedding.

Regardless of venue, the couple will invest a lot of time, effort and money in wedding plans, and it pays to pick up tips from this guide. Distributed by Raincoast Books in Canada, the coilbound, hardcover loose-leaf binder serves as a mini-wedding kit. It includes pockets to tuck away tons of tiny notes that tend to get tattered, misplaced or tossed aside. Normally, odd-shaped receipts and papers are awkward to store, and it takes time to key or scan everything into folders on the computer. Nothing beats one tidy book that keeps everything in one place.

As the author points out, organization is the key to successful planning, regardless of whether a wedding is celebrated at home or far away. As hard as it is to plan a wedding at home, it's doubly difficult to arrange a wedding from a distance. It involves scouting out the location, the local population, possible sites and cultural mores of the area. After advising readers to start well in advance, she charts the course to be taken.

Since most brides and grooms are either in school or immersed in careers, their spare time is limited. Well aware of this, Hotchkiss reminds readers of everything from beauty regimens, budgets and banquets to bridal party presents and packing.

She laces her text with etiquette tips and friendly gestures, ensuring that no detail is left out. Everything is listed in the guide, and the reader need only fill in the blanks or check off the appropriate notations.

Many couples have ambivalent feelings when they contemplate a destination wedding. The author discusses the pros and cons that may help them make a decision. A wedding on the road enables the couple to spend more time with their guests because usually it runs over two or three days, instead of being packed into four or five hours. The décor doesn't have to be as fancy because the destination itself serves as a backdrop. People often make a vacation of the occasion and are more relaxed than when they have to worry about meeting commitments later that day. The bride and groom can plan their wedding and honeymoon in one package.

Among the obvious disadvantages is the expense for guests. Not everyone can afford to take time off or pay for travel and lodging costs. Guests with small children or frail, elderly parents must arrange for caregivers. Hotchkiss proposes the idea of chipping in for an especially dear friend or relative who desperately wants to attend but whose budget won't permit it. She suggests factoring the cost into the wedding budget.

She also provides a rough estimate of how the budget should be allocated. For example, 40 per cent should be spent on the reception, 10 per cent on décor and flowers. Although she is averse to using credit cards to spend beyond the couple's means, Hotchkiss says it's a good way to pay vendors and provide the couple with proof of payment. There are several pages devoted to wedding expenses, and worksheets for readers to use.

The guest list section is divided as follows: the A list includes guests the couple can't live without. The B list is made up of people the couple would like to accommodate. The C list names the runners-up.

Ten pages are devoted to tracking invitations, a record that comes in handy when you confirm the RVSP list, as well as when it's time to write thank-you notes for gifts.

Another worthwhile tip involves e-mail. No matter who is doing the planning, the author advises that individual to sign up for a separate e-mail account just for handling wedding details. It will prove helpful for keeping everything in one place, and it's more discreet than using the office account.

Often, you don't remember questions you need answered until after your interview with the caterer, band or photographer is over. Hotchkiss keeps you one step ahead by listing useful questions pertaining to vendors and service people.

For couples who want a destination wedding but don't know where they can find an appropriate venue to meet their budget and interests, Hotchkiss shares ideas. Deciding factors include the budget, types of venue, style of wedding, all-inclusive packages, proximity, language barrier and climate.

To show appreciation for the trouble family and friends take to attend the wedding, she suggests surprising them with welcome gift bags upon their arrival. Keep the contents simple, and make sure they're practical and not cumbersome to carry. For example, provide a paper gift bag or a reusable beach bag with bottled water, a travel guide and a map.

Although the traditional gown is glamorous, it may not be feasible in certain habitats. Check out the destination you have chosen and guide guests accordingly. Their garb should be suitable for the location, and of course, comfort is paramount for everyone.

Sophistication rules at today's showers

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

The invitation read "a wedding shower."

Although I was expecting the usual silly games, the bedecking of the bride, and someone writing down everything the bride said, which is read out loud later, intimating that this is what she will say on her wedding night, I was more than pleasantly surprised to attend a different kind of shower.

Karen, Michelle and Tara are today's modern young women. Sophistication was the name of the game at the event they organized last summer for their good friend Melissa, who walked down the aisle this month. From the invitation and refreshments to the entertainment, everything was done with "good taste," and it was was certainly different from any bridal shower I've ever attended.

The intimate crowd of relatives and friends were welcomed with Perrier and soft drinks. The coffee table was laden with platters of crudités, bruschetta and smoked salmon on rounds of French bread. Introductions were made, conversation ensued and finally, the entertainer arrived.

No, it wasn't a male stripper, although it was a man! Nick Hamilton, wine consultant and active player in the alcoholic beverage industry since 1980, was there to introduce us to the art of wine tasting. How original! Instead of the bride being the recipient of our gifts, the guests were being treated and taught about wine.

Hamilton first gave a short talk about the technique of tasting wine, explaining that there are three steps: a visual evaluation (looking at the colour and intensity of the liquid in the glass); an olfactory evaluation (smelling the wine); and then the gustatory evaluation (tasting it).

He responded to questions such as, "Is it true that wine has to breathe," explained that a full-body wine has more solid particles in it, and informed the group that different wines do indeed have different scents.

The bride took copious notes, and needless to say, many of the guests were on familiar ground with the discussion of different wines and knew which ones they liked and didn't like. We also learned why we prefer some wines over others: because some may have too much tannin or are more acidic.

Hamilton said that what we eat and drink will reflect on how wine tastes to us. For example, someone who drinks a lot of black coffee won't find wines with a higher tannin content too bitter, while a non-drinking coffee person might.

The afternoon concluded with dessert and much discussion about what we had learned and now understood about the wines we have been drinking, and how and what we will choose in the future. And yes, the honoree received gifts from her registry, a concept that is still very much in for today's brides and grooms.

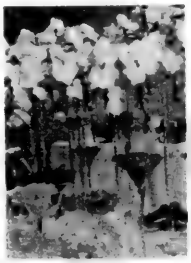
Silk flowers, the real deal

MICHAEL ISENBERG
CJN Intern

Flowers by H.K. doesn't offer unaffordable bouquets or décor. It doesn't even sell real flowers. Yet, the top of the line silk replicas are economically friendly and are becoming increasingly popular, co-executive Dassi Slater says.

Formerly known as Hachnosas Kallah Flowers, the non-profit organization provides centrepieces, candles and other wedding decorations at reasonable rates intended primarily for couples on tight budgets, and all proceeds go to Hachnosas Kallah of Toronto, which in turn, provides funds to needy bridal couples.

"Our aim is two-fold," Slater said in an interview last month. "We provide for the needs of the... wedding [party] inexpensively so that they can have décor, and the money goes right to Hachnosas Kallah."



Silk bouquet.

Founded by Channi Reichman and Robin Werner working out of a closet about 20 years ago, H.K now has a showroom, a 1,500-square-foot warehouse and more than 30 regular volunteers.

"None of us gets paid," said co-executive Estee Gestetner. Although silk flowers require maintenance and repair, Slater said that since they are reusable they are also cheaper than real flowers, saving her money on expenses. This enables H.K. to charge the discounted rates that attract clientele, whose purchase money then goes to the charity.

Centrepieces, for instance, range from $18 to $40.

And because the prices are reasonable, Gestetner said, they get a variety of customers.

"There are people who can easily afford luxury, but come to us because we offer a great product for less. They really love the look of our flowers.

"But more importantly, we want to help Hachnosas Kallah, and so we get many customers who are wealthy but do business with us to support the charitable cause."

Slater added that other people, who use real flowers at events, contribute by donating the vases, bowls and props to H.K.

"We are more than a charity," said co-executive Sheila Jakubovic. We're helping to build the whole community, and get people within it to help us build it."

H.K. caters to more than just weddings, supplying mechitzahs, picture backdrops and more for about 180 events a year.

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

When I want to make a quick dessert, I typically make a crumb cake. Crumb cakes differ from coffee cakes because a crumb cake is mostly crumbs. Sure, coffee cakes will have some on top or swirled throughout, but the bulk of the batter is cake.

The following recipes are perfect at any time of the day, and especially for a brunch.

MARTHA STEWART'S NEW YORK CRUMB CAKE

2 tbsp. oil
4 cups flour, divided
1 1/2 cups sugar
2 1/2 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. salt
1 large egg
1/2 cup milk or non dairy substitute
2 tsp. vanilla extract
1 cup light brown sugar
1 1/2 tsp. cinnamon
1/4 to 1/2 tsp. allspice (optional)
1 cup butter or margarine, melted

Preheat oven to 325 and grease and flour a 9x13-in. baking pan. In a medium bowl, whisk together 1-1/2 cups flour, granulated sugar, baking powder and salt.

In a large bowl, whisk together the egg, milk, oil and vanilla. Mix the dry ingredients into the wet ingredients and spread into pan (you might want to grease your spatula). Set aside.

In another large bowl, whisk together remaining 2-1/2 cups flour, brown sugar and cinnamon (and allspice, if using). Pour melted butter over flour mixture, and stir with a rubber spatula until large crumbs form. Spread evenly over batter in pan. Bake for 25-30 minutes, rotating once, until a tester comes out clean.

CREAM CHEESE-FILLED CRUMB CAKE

I love cheese-filled crumb cakes, and decided to make my own using my recipe for crumb cake and adding a cream cheese filling. The best part of this recipe is that it's not as sweet as the store-bought varieties.

1 cup butter
4 cups all purpose flour
1/4 tsp. salt
2 cups sugar
4 tsp. baking powder
2 eggs
1 cup milk
Cream cheese filling
8 oz. cream cheese, softened
1/2 cup sugar
1 large egg
1 tsp. vanilla extract

For the cake – Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 13x9x2-in. cake pan. In a large bowl, combine the butter, flour, sugar, salt and baking powder. Mix with your hands to form crumbs. Take out just enough for crumbs on top of cake, about 3/4 cup. Set aside. To the remaining crumbs add the eggs and milk; beat well.

For the filling – Place all the ingredients into a medium bowl and beat with a whisk or handheld mixer until smooth.

To assemble – Spread half the batter in the cake pan. Spread the cream cheese mixture on top to within about a 1/2-inch of the edges. Gently spread the remaining batter on top of the cream cheese. Sprinkle the top with the reserved crumbs. Bake for 40-45 minutes or until cake tester inserted in centre comes out clean. Remove from oven and set on a rack to cool. To serve, cut into squares. Leftover cake should be refrigerated after a day.

Preheat oven to 350. Grease two 9-in. cake pans. In a bowl, combine the flour, baking powder, shortening, salt and sugar. Set aside one cup of this mixture as a topping base to use later

In separate bowl, mix the eggs, buttermilk and baking soda together. Blend the remaining portion of the original crumb mixture into the buttermilk mixture, stirring thoroughly. There will be some small lumps in the batter

Take the crumb mixture set aside for the topping and add the brown sugar, coconut and cinnamon. Mix and set aside. Pour the coffee cake batter into prepared cake pans Sprinkle topping equally on top of batter in both pans. Bake at for 35 minutes. Serves 10 to 12.

SOUR CREAM APPLE CRUMB CAKE

This recipe is so close to the one my grandmother used to make that I had to pull it out and check to make sure it wasn't the same one. Close but just different enough to make me want to make both.

1/2 cup soft butter
2 eggs
2 tsp. almond extract
1 cup sugar
1 cup sour cream
2 cup sifted flour
1/4 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. baking soda
1 tsp. salt

Filling

1 1/2 cups peeled, chopped apples (fresh peaches, plums, cherries or berries may also be used)
1 tsp. cinnamon
1/2 cup sugar
1/3 cup chopped pecans or walnuts

Topping

1/4 cup softened butter
1/2 cup flour
1/2 cup Bisquick or pancake mix
1/3 cup sugar

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 9-in. square baking pan. In a bowl, cream together the butter, sugar, eggs, sour cream and almond extract.

In another bowl sift together the flour, baking powder, salt and baking soda. Stir the flour mixture into the butter mixture and blend until smooth.

In another bowl, combine the apples, cinnamon, sugar and nuts. Spread half of the batter in the prepared pan. Top the batter with the apple mixture. Spread the remaining cake batter on top of the apples.

For the topping: In a small bowl, blend butter, flours and sugar to make crumbs with pastry blender or large fork. Mixture should be crumbly. Sprinkle the crumb mixture on top of the cake. Bake for 30 to 35 minutes. Serves 6 to 8.

BLUEBERRY CRUMB CAKE

This crumb cake is best eaten the day it is made because it is so moist. It's still great the next day, but odds are there won't be any left.

3 cups flour
1 cup plus 2 tbsp. sugar
2 tsp. baking powder
3/4 tsp. baking soda
3/4 tsp. salt
3/4 tsp. cinnamon rounded
1/4 tsp. freshly grated nutmeg
1 1/2 sticks (3/4 cup) plus 2 tbsp. unsalted butter, cut into 1/2-in. cubes
2 large eggs, lightly beaten
1 cup sour cream
1 1/2 tsp. vanilla
3 cups fresh blueberries (15 oz.)

Preheat oven to 375. Grease a 9x13-in. baking pan. In a bowl, whisk together the flour, 1 cup sugar, baking powder, baking soda, salt, cinnamon and nutmeg. Cut in 1-1/2 sticks butter into the flour with your fingertips or a pastry blender just until mixture resembles coarse meal with some small (roughly pea-size) butter lumps. Transfer 1-1/2 cups flour mixture to another bowl for crumb topping. Add remaining 2 tablespoons butter and remaining 2 tablespoons sugar to crumb topping, then blend with your fingertips until large lumps form. Set aside.

In another bowl whisk together the eggs, sour cream, and vanilla, then add this mixture to the remaining flour mixture, stirring until just combined.

Fold in the blueberries and spread batter, distributing berries evenly, in prepared baking pan. Sprinkle the crumbs evenly over the batter. Bake until golden and a wooden pick or skewer inserted in centre comes out clean, about 40 to 45 minutes. Cool cake in pan on a rack for 20 minutes before cutting. Make 8 to 12 servings.

GRAHAM CRACKER APPLE CRUMB CAKE

1 pkg. yellow cake mix
1 1/3 cup water
1/3 cup butter or margarine, softened
4 eggs
3/4 cup graham cracker crumbs
1 1/2 tsp. cinnamon
2 1/2 cup pared, chopped apples
1/2 cup brown sugar
2 tbsp. butter
2 tbsp. flour

Heat oven to 350. Grease a 9x13-in. pan. In a bowl of an electric mixer combine the cake mix, water, butter, eggs, graham cracker crumbs and cinnamon. Beat on low for 2 to 3 minutes scraping the sides of the bowl often. Fold in the chopped apples by hand. Pour the batter into the greased pan.

Crumb cake is fast and easy

In a bowl combine the brown sugar, butter and flour. Sprinkle the mixture evenly over the top of the cake. Bake until cake pulls away from sides of pan and toothpick comes out clean. Cool completely. Serves 10 to 12.

British officer defends IDF at UN

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A professional soldier who was refused permission to testify to the Goldstone Commission came to Israel's defence last week in testimony before the UN Human Rights Council (UNHRC).

Col. Richard Kemp, former commander of British forces in Afghanistan, said the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) took exceptional measures to limit civilian casualties in its conflict with Hamas last winter.

"During Operation Cast Lead, the IDF did more to safeguard the rights of civilians in a combat zone than any other army in the history of warfare," Kemp stated. "Israel did so while facing an enemy that deliberately positioned its military capabilities behind the human shield of the civilian population."

Please see related story on page 47

Noting Hamas and Hezbollah's expertise in "driving the media agenda," Kemp said that "both will always have people ready to give interviews condemning Israeli forces for war crimes. They are adept at staging and distorting incidents."

"The IDF took extraordinary measures to give Gaza civilians notice of targeted areas, dropping over two million leaflets and making over 100,000 phone calls," Kemp said. "Many missions that could have taken out Hamas' military capability were aborted to prevent civilian casualties."

Col. Richard Kemp

Despite Kemp's testimony and widespread critique of the Goldstone report, UNHRC last week endorsed its conclusions, which found Israel and Hamas guilty of war crimes and called on both to conduct serious investigations. The report recommended a reference to the International Criminal Court (ICC) prosecutor in The Hague if Israel and Hamas fail to conduct credible investigations within six months. Last week's UNHRC resolution also called on the UN General Assembly to consider the report and to report to the Council whether Israel complied with it.

In a telephone interview with Kemp from Geneva, the military terrorism expert said, "Every army in conflict encounters problems. The confusion of war leads to errors in judgment, and they are not more prevalent in the IDF than in other western forces."

The News in Brief

CANADA

Rabbis Rap Exhibit

TORONTO — The Toronto Board of Rabbis (TBR) is urging the Jewish community to avoid a new exhibit of "plastinated" human cadavers now on display at the Ontario Science Centre. The travelling Body Worlds exhibit, featuring "over 200 authentic human specimens including whole-body plastinates, organs and translucent body slices," is one that "goes against basic Jewish belief and constitutes nivul hamet (desecration of the body)," the TBR said. The board, comprising mostly Conservative and Reform clergy, urged Jewish schools and Jewish public school students to stay away. It said donors' consent to have their remains displayed is irrelevant, since Judaism holds that "our bodies are on loan from the Divine. Respect for the body and prompt burial are mandated, not desecration and display." The Science Centre also hosted a controversial Body Worlds exhibit in 2005.

Dal Honours Schulich

HALIFAX — Dalhousie University honoured Toronto billionaire Seymour Schulich last week for his $20-million gift to its law faculty by renaming it the Schulich School of Law. Most of the gift will go to create 41 scholarships, the school said. Schulich has also made major donations to York University in Toronto, McGill University in Montreal, the University of Western Ontario, the University of Calgary and Haifa's Technion – Israel Institute of Technology, which renamed its chemistry faculty in his honour.

WORLD

Jewish Music Feted

RABAT — Jewish music will be the focus of an annual Moroccan music festival. Matrouz, the Moroccan Jewish musical tradition, will be featured at the festival Oct. 29-Nov. 1 in the port city of Essaouira, AFP reported. The concerts will bring together "our poets, our musicians and our singers, Muslims and Jews, to sing and dance together," Andre Azoulay, festival chairman and an adviser to King Mohammed VI, said.

UJC Changes Name

NEW YORK — The board of trustees of the United Jewish Communities officially voted to change the name of the umbrella organization of the Jewish federation system to the Jewish Federations of North America, from the United Jewish Communities (UJC). The group – which represents 157 federations and 400 independent "network communities" across the continent – is also adopting a new logo.

Chabad Goes Halal

SYDNEY — A Chabad Lubavitch-run kosher community kitchen that feeds the needy gained halal certification, making it acceptable to observant Muslims. Our Big Kitchen in Sydney, Australia, run by the Yeshiva Center, became halal last week in the presence of New South Wales Premier Nathan Rees, who learned to make challah on his visit. Sophie Abuta, a Palestinian Australian whose husband donated tiles for the kitchen, said she hoped it will help Jews and Palestinians "cook our way to peace." The kitchen, founded by Brooklyn-born Rabbi Dovid Slavin in 2007, has been visited by Prime Minister Kevin Rudd, Gov.-Gen. Quentin Bryce and other dignitaries.

France Showcases Israeli Artists

PARIS — Israeli artists are being showcased throughout France in honour of Tel Aviv's 100th birthday.

From theatre to painting, poetry and architecture, hundreds of works by Israeli and Tel Aviv artists are on display in France's largest cities this month and through early December. Both Paris and Tel Aviv helped organize the events. The two cities "have co-operated actively," the city of Paris said in a statement, and this fall's cultural events are "meant to honour that friendship."

The International City of Arts in Paris launched an exhibit last week on the unique modern architecture of Tel Aviv, in a show titled The White City. From Nov. 4 to Dec. 6, films illustrating life in Tel Aviv will be shown in Paris' Forum of Images. Filmmaker Eytan Fox and actress Gila Almagor will be among those given special recognition.

A French-translated version of the classic play Yaacobi and Leidental, by Tel Aviv playwright Hanokh Levin, is among several Israeli arts performances currently in theatres. Works by internationally recognized artists Michal Rovner and Sigalit Landau, and sculptor Ruth Adler, have also been on display throughout the French capital. Israeli films are also being screened in Toulouse, Marseille, Cannes and Montpellier.

Shuls avoid handshakes to thwart H1N1

Is elbow bump becoming the new norm?

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The elbow bump is replacing the handshake – at least for some shul-goers concerned about the H1N1 flu virus – at several synagogues in Toronto and elsewhere.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, senior rabbi of Beth Tzedec Congregation, says his congregants started using the elbow bump in 2003 during the SARS crisis.

"I think in Toronto we're much more conscious of all of this, because we went through the SARS epidemic. I think we may be more prepared as a city because of what happened."

At Beth Tzedec, clergy have been encouraging people to refrain from embracing, kissing and shaking hands since before the High Holidays, the rabbi told The CJN last week.

He continues to greet worshippers in a receiving line at the end of Shabbat services, but instead of shaking hands, he said, "We bump elbows, do fist bumps. Sometimes I'll do a little bow, so I'm acknowledging people, I'm welcoming them.

"We don't want to be vectors for disease, but we nonetheless want to be friendly," he said. "People here joke about it, but they understand.

"If a number of people shake my hand, I can go wash my hand," he said. "But the real problem is, if someone who has an illness shakes my hand, that I could be a transmitter.

More than a cause

From the editor's desk...

Last month, a column written in the Forward by Jay Michaelson struck a raw nerve among supporters of Israel. Its very title was like a sharp pointed fingernail scraping across a chalkboard, sending lashing waves of discomfort through an already anxious collective Jewish nervous system.

"How I'm Losing My Love For Israel" is a confessional by a talented writer. Less a cri de coeur than a personal statement of politics, Michaelson carefully explains his dilemma.

"I've loved Israel for decades, lived there for three years and studied in detail the subtleties of its society and conflicts. And so it is with the sadness that accompanies the end of any affair that I notice my love is starting to wane."

He gives four reasons for the falling away of his love for the Jewish state.

• Exhaustion. Supporting Israel these days is emotionally exhausting for Michaelson, especially as he explains, in his circle of friends, among whom he admits "supporting Israel is like supporting segregation, apartheid or worse."

• The Israel he loves is increasingly disappearing. Michaelson points to the present makeup of Jerusalem, which has changed too much from the idyllic place of his student days to sustain his affection.

• He has started to second-guess the love itself. Michaelson wonders "how much of [his love] is built upon a foundation of deliberately constructed ignorance, a result of years of selective education." He has difficulty reconciling loving the Israel of today that, for him has become unlovable. "I sip my limonana, and five miles away a mother is harassed at a checkpoint," he offers as an example of an aspect of modern Israel that he no longer wishes to ignore.

• He feels personally implicated by Israel's injustices. This is the least articulated of Michaelson's reasons. Essentially, however, as love entails responsibility, he no longer wishes to be responsible for that which he no longer loves.

To be sure, the author's political philosophy is very much on the left of the political spectrum, hence his increasing disconnectedness from his peers on the subject of Israel. But Michaelson's article is not to be dismissed as simply more of the same from the disaffected left. He still views himself as a supporter of Israel and himself has a following among the younger, "progressive" cadre of American Jews.

It is for this reason that historian Jonathan Sarna of Brandeis University, currently on sabbatical in Israel, wrote about Michaelson's column in a subsequent issue of the Forward. Sarna's article ominously titled "Why are American Jews abandoning Israel?" responds not to the substance of Michaelson's arguments but rather to the phenomenon of its appearance. Citing the research of sociologist Stephen Cohen, Sarna confirms "a growing distancing from Israel of American Jews... most pronounced among younger Jews."

But Sarna also tries to explain why this might be: "In place of the utopia that we had hoped Israel might become, young [American] Jews today often view Israel through the eyes of contemporary media: they fixate upon its unloveliest warts," Sarna writes. And then, he offers a prescription, albeit general, for bridging the distance into more manageable, paces and steps.

"When the bloom falls off of young love, there are always those who announce that their relationship is in trouble and prepare for divorce. So it is today with too many American Jews and their "waning love" [Michaelson's words] for Israel. The deepest and most meaningful of relationships, however, survive disappointments. By focusing upon all that they nevertheless share in common, and all that they might yet accomplish together in the future, American Jews and Israelis can move past this crisis in their relationship and settle in, as partners, for the long haul ahead." (My emphasis)

Echoes of Sarna's prescription are expressed by senior vice-president and senior fellow in Jerusalem Rabbi Daniel Gordis but far more forcefully.

In a profoundly moving, hard-hitting article titled "No Right to Exhaustion," posted on his blog, scholar, writer, thinker, the American-born Gordis responds to the substance of Michaelson's arguments.

I reproduce only one small quote. "Given that [Israel] is the very foundation of the resurrection and rebirth of our ancient people... [words Michaelson used in his article] how dare we not love it, even with all its faults? Is love [of] Israel exhausting? Of course, it is. Does it require lots of equivocation? Yes, it does. Is it very unpopular in lots of circles? No question.

But it's bigger than me. And it's bigger than you. It matters more than all of us... So given that, I don't think we have a right to exhaustion... Because loving Israel isn't like an affair. [Michaelson's word] It's a totally different thing. In a relationship, the person I love and I both matter – more or less equally, I guess. But not here. In this, I don't matter. You don't matter. Only justice matters. Only the future matters. Only the Jewish people's survival matters. And without this place, there is no future, no Jewish people."

Gordis' essay is compulsory reading. Israel is more than a cause behind which one rallies, or one does not. It is more than a moral resort, as author Saul Bellow once wrote, for the social activists of the world. Israel – the idea and the place – is at the very centre of Jewish faith and peoplehood.

Not knowing this, let alone feeling it, is part of the reason for the "growing distancing from Israel of American Jews."

UNICEF AMBASSADOR VISITS SDEROT: American actress and UNICEF goodwill ambassador Mia Farrow visited Sderot earlier this week, two days after visiting Gaza and meeting with Palestinian children injured during Operation Cast Lead last winter. Speaking at a press conference in the Sderot police station, with the remains of hundreds of rockets and mortar shells behind her, Farrow said she feels like an old friend of the State of Israel. "As a grandmother and a mother, I feel that we, the grownups, don't work well enough on either side of the border between Israel and Gaza. Children on both sides want peace and quiet, and cannot be held responsible for the actions of the adults." Israeli legal advisor praises Canada's 'pro-human rights' stance at the UN

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

As the repercussions of the Goldstone report continue to reverberate in the United Nations, an Israeli legal adviser lauded Canada for supporting the Jewish state when others were assailing it from all sides

Daniel Taub, principal legal adviser in Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, said that "Canada has got a very important role to play in human rights institutions the role of sanity and protecting the credibility of these institutions.

"When Canada was criticized for taking positions perceived as pro-Israel, [it's] actually taking positions that are pro-human rights," he asserted.

Taub, who has participated in Mideast peace negotiations going back to the Oslo process, was in Canada last week to attend a conference on international law sponsored by Foreign Affairs and International Trade Canada (DFAIT). He piggybacked a speaking tour onto that, meeting with DFAIT officials, military lawyers, court clerks and academics, presenting the Israeli perspective on the Goldstone mission and the Gaza conflict it ostensibly investigated. He spoke at the University of Toronto law school on "The role of international law in peacemaking."

Taub said he was quizzed about the kind of legal advice the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) received during its Gaza mission last winter and why Israel refused to co-operate with the Goldstone inquiry.

"When we looked at the mandate and the composition of the mission, we didn't see any reasonable hope for it to come out with a balanced report," he explained. (The mandate has been criticized from various quarters as presupposing Israeli war crimes. One commission member said as much prior to the investigation.)

The report, which was debated at the UN Human Rights Council (UNHRC) last week, "justified Israel's fears," Taub said. "Its narrative is remarkably hostile to Israel. It's as if Gaza had nothing to do with the 12,000 missiles [Palestinians launched onto Israel], the smuggling of weapons or Israeli self-defence.

"Instead, it was a narrative of a deliberate attack against Palestinian civilians. That allegation is vicious, unfounded from Israel's perspective. There's nothing to debate.

"It's also dismissive of Israel's legal system and problematic for those vying with terrorism," he continued. "It's not just that the report is very limiting in what it permits Israel to do, it's very dismissive of the terrorist threat."

Taub was pleasantly surprised that this view was shared by many of those he met. "I've been impressed by the level of understanding of the Israeli position, and when there's disagreement, there's been a genuine understanding of the dilemmas Israel is facing," he said.

"Israel may not have all the right answers, but it is asking the right questions," particularly in dealing with "an adversary that not only does not accept the laws and principles of armed conflict, but uses those principles to hide behind."

Elaborating, Taub said that during the Gaza operation, IDF soldiers found booby-trapped civilian areas and Hamas using women and children to shield themselves from attack.

The IDF receives legal advice that restricts the kind of operations they can undertake, he said. The advice is tailored to take into account overview from the Israeli Supreme Court, which has shown it will step in and "constrain the kinds of activities Israel's security establishment can do. The IDF wants legal advice. It wants to know it is acting in conformity with international law."

On a related front, Taub said he was concerned by the Palestinian Authority's request that prosecutor Luis Moreno-Ocampo of the International Criminal Court (ICC) investigate Israel for war crimes. The ICC's jurisdiction is limited to conflicts involving events that took place on the territory of state parties or that involved signatories to the treaty creating it. (The Palestinian Authority is not a state and Israel never signed the ICC treaty.)

"Israel is on record saying he has no jurisdiction... Moreno-Ocampo said it's a complicated legal question and he's looking at it. That gives [the request] a credibility we don't think it should have," and is a clear "politicization" of a legal process, Taub said.

The old hatred is deforming the world

In a specially convened session last week, the United Nations Human Rights Council (UNHRC) voted to endorse the Goldstone report on Israel's war with Hamas, sending it to the Security Council, the next step in the Orwellian process leading toward the public lynching of the Jewish State. The report was adopted by a vote of 25 in favour, six opposed, 11 abstentions. Five countries did not vote.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu warned last Friday that Israel must prepare for a protracted struggle against the report. The Israeli Foreign Ministry issued a statement that "Israel will continue to exercise its right to self-defence and to preserve the security of its citizens. Israel believes that the decision harms efforts to protect human rights in accordance with international law and hinders efforts to promote the peace process, as well as encouraging terror organizations around the world."

In perfect fealty to and execution of the Orwellian script, Israel's antagonist, Hamas – one of the pre-eminent terror organizations in the world, and recognized as such by most of the western world, including of course, Canada – gleefully welcomed the UNHRC vote.

Hamas spokesman Taher al-Nono was quite giddy. "The Palestinian government welcomes the endorsement on the Goldstone report and thanks the friendly countries which voted in favour of the report," he said. He looked down the road to a more fulfilling future because he saw the acceptance of the report as "the beginning of the prosecution of the leaders of the occupation."

The "occupation" of course is his and his colleagues' preoccupation. But by "occupation," they do not mean the Israeli presence in Gaza. For there is none. They do mean the Israeli presence in the West Bank, even though it is less than 10 per cent of the Arab presence there. Their real meaning, however, is the Israeli presence in Israel.

In a recent article in The New Yorker, Adam Gopnik wrote that "the Dreyfus affair was the first indication that a new epoch of progress and cosmopolitan optimism would be met by a countervailing wave of hatred that deformed the next half-century of European history." Alas, the astute Gopnik understated the extent of the destructive and deformative power of that very old hatred. Well past the first half of the last century, the hatred of Jews and especially of the idea of a sovereign Jewish state in the Middle East, like a worm insinuated in marrow, is eating away at the social sinews of some societies and deforming the very moral fibre of international law.

The nations of the world, too self-interested, too blind, too ignorant or too craven to stand up to Israel's enemies, are complicit in the disfigurement of international law. Law that is so misshapen it cannot be recognized as lawful will one day be twisted back by the despots and tyrants who wield it for their malevolent purposes, ensnaring all those bystanding countries, choking off resort to conscience and to the valid rule of law.

Israel was in a major economic crisis with inflation and cost of living soaring by over 21 per cent in one month. Rumours circulated that Washington was prepared to postpone receipt from Israel of $500 million (US) in debt that was coming due, and the Bank of Israel was considering abolishing the agorah, worth 1/100th of a shekel.

Israel's water woes

Yair Lootstein provides a basic overview of Israel's water woes and proposes some solutions to the near crisis shortages in his column "Israel's water problem more pressing than ever" (Sept. 24). However, he overlooks one important factor in Israel's water economy – water reservoirs. Over the past decade, the Jewish National Fund/Keren Kayemet Le'Yisrael has built more than 200 reservoirs around the country. Some are freshwater pools that catch runoff water, but most are recycled water reservoirs. The total dynamic capacity of these reservoirs is more than 270 million cubic metres of water, supplying almost 10 per cent of Israel's agricultural water needs, thereby freeing up precious water resources for Israel's increasing domestic demand.

Cynical attempt to win votes

Letter writer Mark Greenberg argues that we should be grateful for Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty's one-time $15-million gift to the Jewish community ("Time to move beyond divisive politics," Oct. 15). I disagree. The Liberal government denies our community approximately $65 million a year due to its discriminatory policy of funding Roman Catholic schools, while not extending the same benefit to our educational institutions. McGuinty is simply returning to us a very small percentage of our hard-earned tax dollars. This is a cynical attempt by the government to win our votes despite its unjustifiable position on educational funding and its shameful attacks on our community during the last election. I agree that we should "move beyond divisive politics." The premier can easily do so by extending public funding to all schools, irrespective of religious faith.

Comedian not funny

I read with interest Janice Arnold's article detailing the decision by Just for Laughs (JFL) to remove Irish comedian Tommy Tiernan from its October Canadian tour ("Comic dropped from show," Toronto edition, Oct. 15). Undeniably, Tiernan engaged in a repulsive "comedy" routine that in the most callous and toxic manner imaginable targeted Jews and most specifically Holocaust survivors. There can be no excuse for such horrid behaviour.

During this fiasco, Canadian Jewish Congress was in touch with JFL. We very much wanted to assist Tiernan in understanding that comedy, even edgy comedy, must be tempered with a modicum of sensibility. Tiernan is part of a new wave of comedians, many of whom believe that "anything goes." He took his Holocaust routine to the edge and clearly fell over. We offered Tiernan, through JFL, the opportunity to join us at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Holocaust Education Centre and meet with those people, Shoah survivors, whom he so poisonously targeted. Our hope was that he might see beyond comedy and understand that the murder of wives and husbands, children, brothers and sisters, six million murders, is not something that comedy can embrace.

While Tiernan will not be participating in this month's JFL comedy tour, our invitation to him remains open.

CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress

Christian support of Israel

Rabbi Dow Marmur reviews a wide spectrum of opinion on the Christian support of Israel and, per se, the fight against anti-Semitism in his column "A sinister agenda" (Oct. 8) However, he restricts his reference to the Christian faith as that of the Catholic Church, when in fact, numerous other streams of the Christian religious world are more vociferous and supportive of Israel than the Catholic Church.

Attempts to have Jews betray their faith, by coercion or otherwise, have been going on through the centuries. Sadly, many Jews have been lost. Although we must be wary of any effort to convert Jews, be it either overtly or covertly, the support of the Christian world should not be dismissed.

Israel and the Jewish people are in a life-and-death struggle for their well-being and very existence. We should not be deterred in welcoming the support of righteous gentiles, just as we expose, to its everlasting shame, the immorality of the United Church of Canada in its attempt to undermine Israel.

Christian support should be interpreted as a sincere expression of moral outrage at the injustice, hatred and evil being perpetrated by the enemies of Israel and the Jewish people.

A 3-minute video may prove Iran's nuclear intentions

By YOSSI MELMAN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

The last place you would expect to hear the apocalyptic soundtrack of the movie Chariots of Fire would be in Iran. This 1981 film recounts the story of a Jewish British athlete and his teammate, a devout Christian, who refuses to compete on Sunday, his day of rest.

But this soundtrack accompanies a highly secret video, produced by Iranian nuclear scientists, but never screened before the general public – a three-minute film depicting a computerized simulation of the detonation of a warhead, most likely a nuclear one. Whether it was intentional or merely coincidental, the nameless Iranian editor decided to use the soundtrack of the British blockbuster to accompany the video.

This film was, however, screened on Feb. 26, 2008, in the fourth-floor conference room of Building C at the Vienna headquarters of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) overlooking the Danube. The host of the screening was Finnish nuclear physicist Olli Heinonen, the IAEA's deputy director general and head of its inspection department, officially called the Department of Safeguards. In attendance were representatives of the 35 member states that constitute the organization's board of governors. It was one of the most important meetings ever held by the IAEA.

In the seven years prior to the gathering, Heinonen visited Iran many times as part of his inspections on behalf of the agency. Iranian intelligence agents followed his every move, hoping to catch him doing something that could either embarrass him or be used for blackmail purposes. They offered him bribes, but the stern-faced Finnish nuclear scientist never took the bait.

Heinonen even laid out his own money for the clock with a Farsi inscription that now adorns one of the walls in his office. He found it in one of the warehouses of the Kalaye Electric Company, in the southern outskirts of Tehran. The Iranians were adamant that Kalaye produced only electronic watches and clocks, although the IAEA discovered that it clandestinely manufactures centrifuges for uranium enrichment. These centrifuges are being used today in Iran's nuclear program, both at the uranium-enrichment facility in Natanz and at the recently discovered plant in Qom.

A dedicated official, esteemed by agency colleagues for his integrity, Heinonen is known to oppose the conciliatory approach toward Iran that has for years been the policy of IAEA director general Mohamed ElBaradei, who will be leaving his post at the end of the year. Heinonen managed to recruit his ElBaradei's agreement to invite the representatives of the board of governors' member states to the briefing on that wintry Vienna day. The purpose: a briefing on the suspected "military aspects" of Iran's nuclear program, which Tehran claims is intended only for peaceful purposes.

The video depicted a room made of stone. At the centre stood a Perspex mock-up – equipped with a flashing red light – of a ball-shaped bomb resting in the metallic, gold-plated cone of a missile warhead. In the most important scene in the film, the computer simulation shows the launched warhead re-entering the atmosphere and exploding 600 metres above the earth's surface. According to experts, this is the ideal altitude for detonating a nuclear bomb in order to generate the maximum degree of destruction on the ground.

At the briefing, Heinonen noted that the type of warhead represented by the model could fit an Iranian Shahab missile.

Thus, with the soundtrack of Chariots of Fire in the background, the participants in Vienna had the impression they were viewing a PR marketing film produced to advance the sales of some corporation. Some present thought it was a training film intended to demonstrate to senior Iranian officials – either members of the country's political or religious echelons, or the top brass of its Revolutionary Guard – that Tehran had reached an advanced stage in its nuclear program.

In addition to the video, Heinonen displayed documents in Farsi, which he said dated back to July 2003-January 2004, and which included a number of sketches. Both the film and sketches showed a machine that can produce lightweight aluminum warheads.

Heinonen was cautious, emphasizing there was no evidence proving that what they had seen was necessarily a mock-up of a nuclear warhead; it could have been a conventional one. Nonetheless, his listeners were stunned. It was clear to most of them that it was likely a nuclear device.

As one of those who was present said to Ha'aretz: "If it walks like a duck and talks like a duck, it must be a duck." That is, one can assume the Iranians have conducted research and calculations for weaponization – how to assemble a nuclear device – as part of a secret military nuclear program alongside their civilian one.

At the briefing, Heinonen told participants that he and other IAEA officials had asked the Iranians for an explanation of the video – specifically, about the warhead, its simulated re-entry into the earth's atmosphere, the detonation of its nuclear payload at an altitude of 600 metres, the ball-like mechanism and so on. However, as befitting their usual tactics, the Iranians delayed their response and then argued that the materials – the footage, photos and sketches – were a total fabrication, produced by the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency or Israel's Mossad, or perhaps by both of them together. According to the Iranians, the forgery was intended to frame them, to present Iran as a country engaged in developing nuclear weapons, and thus operating in blatant violation of international conventions.

The Iranians' next move was to admit half-heartedly that the video was authentic, but that it depicted a computer simulation of a re-entry vehicle of a conventional warhead – not a nuclear one.

Three years prior to the Vienna gathering, reports leaked to the media, and also published by Ha'aretz, already claimed that Iran was involved in secret research for weaponization purposes. The reports were based on secret documents that had reached the IAEA. This data, according to the reports, had been concealed in a laptop smuggled out of Iran, ostensibly by a scientist who had been a part of his country's nuclear program, and who handed the computer over to the German intelligence service, the BND.

Recently, however, a new version of events has surfaced. David Albright, a physicist who serves as president of the Institute for Science and International Security (ISIS) in Washington, D.C., wrote that the data was smuggled out as "electronic media" and not via a laptop. A former IAEA inspector, Albright is considered to have very good relations with the agency as well as with American intelligence. In recent years, ISIS has beat even the media in publicizing on its website information about the nuclear programs of Iran and Syria. Indeed, Albright was the first to publish aerial photos of the nuclear site at Qom.

International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) official logo.

Albright explained last month that the scientist who smuggled out the secret data was indeed an agent for German intelligence, who suspected Iran's security services had discovered his espionage activities. For that reason, he gave his wife the "electronic media," including the video, and instructed her to go to Turkey and hand it over to American diplomats there. A short while afterward, reported Albright, the scientist-agent vanished without a trace: apparently, he was arrested by Iranian intelligence and executed for treason. When it reached the United States, the data was sent to the Sandia National Laboratories to verify whether it was authentic and whether the simulation of the detonation of a nuclear device had, in fact, been carried out. Subsequently, probably in 2005, the information was transmitted in censored format to the IAEA. However, after examination, the organization's experts could not determine definitively whether it was genuine.

Nonetheless, the data convinced the IAEA's board of governors that Iran had indeed reneged on its obligations, and the agency decided to submit a report on the matter to the UN Security Council. In 2006, that body imposed sanctions on Iran for breaching its safeguards agreements and called upon it to suspend its uranium-enrichment activities. However, because of the internal dispute within the IAEA, the Vienna briefing was held only two years later.

Heinonen and his team compiled a 67-page report and asked ElBaradei to include it as an appendix to one of the IAEA's seasonal reports on Iran. However, on this issue, ElBaradei gained the upper hand: convinced that there was no evidence of an Iranian military program, he refused to append the internal report and even asked that the fact of its very existence be concealed.

A few weeks ago, Ha'aretz revealed the existence of the appendix. However, the bitter truth is that such information cannot change the reality on the ground. Iran continues to enrich uranium while claiming that it has no military nuclear program. Russia and China insist on opposing harsh sanctions on Iran. Israeli spokespersons have hinted at, or even threatened, a military operation against Iran, but they prefer it be carried out by the United States. The United States and the European Union oppose the use of force and find themselves isolated in their attempts to deal with Tehran's nuclear challenge. Last week, the IAEA said it had no comment when asked by Ha'aretz about the information presented at the Vienna briefing.

Rabbi Sacks' future tense

Sir Jonathan Sacks, soon to be inducted into the British House of Lords with the title of Baron Sacks of Aldgate, is well known as Chief Rabbi of the United Kingdom. Arguably the most philosophical religious leader in Britain – and possibly the world – today, Rabbi Sacks has a unique ability to weave together religion, culture, morality, politics and modernity in a way that is at once reasonable and understandable, as well as so important to the discussion that links Jews to their history, their land, and their place in the world.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Never one to shy away from topics that are challenging or controversial, his previous books, among them Dignity of Difference: How to Avoid the Clash of Civilizations, The Home We build Together: Recreating Society and To Heal a Fractured World: The Ethics of Responsibility, speak to the earnestness and enduring relevance of his worldview.

In his most recent work, Future Tense: A Vision for Jews and Judaism in the Global Culture, Rabbi Sacks asks what he describes as "the great question... who Jews are and what is being asked of them at this time."

Centred on the premise that Jews tend to be "a people that dwells alone," he provides a compelling argument on why this need not necessarily be so. In making the case, he reflects cogently on key elements of the current predicaments relating to Jewish identity and Jewish continuity.

He expresses no illusions about the mounting threats of anti-Semitism, which he portrays as a mutating virus (with anti-Zionism as its most current manifestation), nor does he shirk from emphasizing the clear and present internal threats to Jewish survival that come as a result of assimilation and factionalism.

All of this notwithstanding, he warns against Jewish isolationism. "Jews," he states, "have turned inwards; they need to turn outwards. They are conscious of being different, but so is every member of a minority, and in a global age, every group is a minority. Our uniqueness is our universality, and it is precisely by sharing our uniqueness that we enlarge the heritage of humankind."

While he provides some finite examples of how Jews (and Israel) might better engage the world at large, this, as his major focus, could have been even more prescriptive. Otherwise, there is more than enough food for thought in Future Tense to re-invigorate our discourse on the future of Judaism, not only as it relates to Jewish life and the State of Israel, but also in regard to its interaction with, and contribution to, the developing global culture of the 21st century.

Don't worry — the kids are all right

We often hear of modern Israel becoming a post-Zionist state, having lost its roots, vision and direction. Judging by the potential and selflessness of many of our young people, I'd say that this premise is hogwash.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

Kids mature earlier here in Israel. It has to do with the complex milieu in which they grow up and the army service they're expected to do upon reaching age 18.

They start hearing from the military in 10th grade. During that year, 16-year-olds begin receiving formal military orders requiring them to attend interviews, medicals and psychometric examinations aimed at establishing their physical and mental fitness for service and the type of units they might join. Even before they actually enlist, the process can be difficult. Kids don't always get into the units they want and must deal with the disappointment.

After they're inducted, things don't necessarily become easier. Basic training is gruelling, both physically and emotionally, especially – but not only – for fresh conscripts in combat units. Young people, used to their parents' pampering, often find the rigorous training exhausting and demeaning. They lose their sense of personal sovereignty.

Kids are often changed by the experience. They do things they don't necessarily want to because they're ordered to do so, and they learn about teamwork, but also to be independent. Some become leaders. Many deal with issues that few kids their age must face elsewhere. Serving at a roadblock in the West Bank or going into battle in Gaza is enough to provide moral dilemmas and nightmares for years.

If giving up two or three years of their lives isn't enough, thousands of high school graduates choose to spend an extra year – before enlisting – doing public service in poor neighbourhoods, development towns, absorption centres and the like.

Others join year-long programs, called mechinot, that prepare them to take leadership roles in the military and teach them about the diversity of views on many important issues in Israel. Kids live together and learn to fend for themselves. More than 2,000 young adults are currently enrolled in 34 different mechinot around the country.

Every generation believes that it was more able and willing to give to the country than the present one. Today, these sentiments are fed by reports of increasing rates of draft-dodging and desertion. The numbers, however, don't support this impression. According to recent data, 25 per cent of Jewish males required to serve in the military don't actually end up serving, up from 12 per cent in 1980. The increase appears alarming, but it isn't really, primarily due to the dramatic rise in potential haredi inductees, most of whom get service exemptions or deferments. Experts who analyzed the numbers found that actual draft-dodging only rose from four to five per cent over the past 25 years.

Meanwhile, motivation is rising. This past August, 72 per cent of recruits who were fit to serve in combat units asked to serve in such units, up four per cent from last year.

The picture is not all rosy, however. As in other western societies, young people use drugs, and alcohol abuse among adolescents and young adults is on the rise. Police stats suggest there's a general decline in youth crime, but serious crime is on the rise.

Soldiers on weekend leave from their army units go to pubs and discotheques, enjoying well-deserved breaks from the army. At least once a month we learn of the tragic results of a night out on the town. A month ago, in Rishon Lezion, a soldier in the Golani Brigade who fought in Gaza during Operation Cast Lead was stabbed to death on his way to an evening of fun with friends when he got into a squabble with drunken youths only 200 metres from his home.

So things aren't idyllic, but they never were. Yet with the calibre and altruism of many of our youth today, we can rest assured that the future of this country will be in good hands – better hands than those of today.

On a personal note, it's not easy being a soldier's parent. My kids are younger, but in the last year, some of our friends' kids have begun military service. Parents' lives change. Some worry constantly, especially those with kids in combat units. They don't take vacations abroad, at least not together, and want to be around for any eventuality and to provide TLC when their kids do get home.

Muslims find minority status scary

I recently took part in a conference on peace and identity organized by a Palestinian academic and held in east Jerusalem. The venue and participants were an unusual departure from the usual framework in which fringe Israeli NGO officials supported by the New Israel Fund and Palestinians allied with the PLO take turns attacking "settlers" and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. I and most of my Israeli colleagues aren't generally invited to these events and see no value in participating.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

But this conference was different, and there was a genuine effort to debate sharply conflicting histories and interpretations that are at the core of the conflict. The organizers recognized the need for going beyond the standard clichés about occupation, settlements and Goldstone-type allegations targeting Israel.

As the first speaker, I focused on my perception of the core issue – the Arab rejection, since 1947, of the legitimacy of Israel and Jewish sovereign equality, and the need to change this in order to end the conflict. I explained that settlements were the results of this rejectionism and not the cause. For the audience of Palestinian intellectuals and politicians, and European media and diplomatic supporters based in Jerusalem, this was a difficult message, and both during the question-and-answer session and after the panel, I was engulfed by arguments.

In the course of the discussions that followed, including the formal presentations from Palestinian panelists, I was struck by both the newness of my words to their ears and the difficulty they had in dealing with them. Many rejected my comparison of the legitimacy of a Jewish state and the more than 50 officially Islamic countries, but they had no rationale to support these positions. Similarly, a group of highly emotional Europeans who said they are "committed to peace" objected to the comparison of Jewish Israel with their countries, whose calendars and dominant cultures are clearly Christian.

During these often heated exchanges, it was clear that most of the participants, who have spent years in peace dialogues, had never really considered these core issues. Hundreds of millions of dollars spent on dialogue programs, "seeds of peace" camps and similar activities had been wasted on the symptoms while avoiding the root of the conflict.

For Palestinians living in Israel (not in the Palestinian Authority), the acceptance of minority status in a Jewish-majority society, remains unimaginable. One group approached me with the question of "what happens to us in a Jewish state," as if they and their parents had not been living here since 1948. They still see Israel as a temporary interruption in the natural (Islamic) order and have avoided dealing with the need for acceptance of this political fact of life.

While Jews have lived as minorities, this concept is frightening to most Muslims. In many Islamic-dominated countries, such as Saudi Arabia, Iran, Sudan and Malaysia, members of other religions are persecuted and harassed. In Lebanon, the substantial Christian minority is trying to resist threats from Shia forces headed by Hezbollah and backed by Iran. At best, Jews and Christians are, or at least were, tolerated as dhimmis – second-class citizens.

Arab images of minority "rights" are based on the experiences of the Christian Copt minority in Egypt, which is often subject to discrimination and violent attacks, despite claims of official government protection. Some, like former Sadat confidant and subsequent UN secretary general Butros Butros Ghalli, can rise to influential positions as individuals and Egyptian nationalists, but not as leaders of the Coptic community. Similarly, under Saddam Hussein, Iraqi Christians such as Tariq Aziz held high positions, but only when this served the leader's interests.

For Arabs and Muslims, any form of minority status, even in a democratic and tolerant western society such as Israel, is unacceptable – there is no rubric in which to imagine the details. Islam is not a religion of minorities and pluralism.

This is where the heavy lifting needs to be done to promote the end of conflict and mutual acceptance, but these issues are hardly on the agenda.

The Kirshner File

A broken doll at Auschwitz-Birkenau

There it was, a broken, decapitated child's doll, displayed on purple sheets inside a glass case containing children's clothes, socks and shoes.

The doll, its right leg and fleshy pink knee smudged, was clad in a short red and blue tartan skirt, a discoloured pinkish blouse and a brown jacket with short sleeves and four brass buttons on each side.

Sheldon Kirshner in Poland

Around its neck was a black bow tie, which was slightly askew. A black belt with a silver buckle was cinched around its tiny waist. Part of its head was plainly visible, lying discarded on one side. A wig and a portion of its scalp rested on the other side.

Of all the heart-rending sights I encountered in the former Auschwitz-Birkenau concentration camp, this one had the greatest effect on me.

As a father of two grown daughters, I was struck by this forsaken doll as I wandered through Block 5 of a Nazi death camp that callously consumed the lives of 1.1 million victims, 90 per cent of whom were Jews.

The name of the Jewish child who clutched this doll before she was ruthlessly killed was not documented. She is a statistic, one of the more than one million Jewish children swallowed up by the Holocaust.

As I gazed at the doll one recent morning, I asked myself a rush of questions. Who was this child? How old was she? What was the colour of her eyes and hair? How tall was she? Where did she come from? When did she arrive at this diabolical place? What were her hopes and dreams? Could she have been confused and frightened? What were her last thoughts and words as she was herded into a gas chamber?

Contemplating her fate, my mind raced back to my own family history.

In the summer of 1944, after the Lodz ghetto was liquidated, my mother, her seven-year-old son – the older brother I never knew – and her second husband-to-be, my father, were transported to Auschwitz.

My parents survived. The boy did not.

Since that black, incomprehensible moment, not a single day has passed without his image having flashed before my mother's eyes.

The pain is deep, unimaginable.

In the same barrack, once reserved for emaciated Polish, Russian and Jewish prisoners, more artifacts of the detritus of death were on display.

A field of eye glasses and prosthetics. A dozen prayer shawls, hung out like so much laundry. Kitchenware, mainly pots and pans. A jumble of suitcases, the names of their owners stencilled in neat lettering. A mountain of shoes. A sea of shoe polish, brushes, combs, creams and cosmetics.

A child's doll

The exhibits in the other other blocks were no less jolting: stark photographs of Jews arriving at the camp. A map of Europe with lines converging on Auschwitz, the northernmost line starting in Oslo and the southernmost one ending at the Greek island of Rhodes. Empty canisters of Zyklon-B, the cyanide-gas-cum-insecticide developed, ironically, by Fritz Haber, a German-Jewish chemist who won the 1918 Nobel Prize. A lumpy mound of dusty hair, shorn from some 40,000 people. Registration cards and photographs of newly arrived inmates.

The gas chamber, with its chimney poking harmlessly into the sky, looked deceptively innocuous until my guide, Pawel Sawicki, diverted my attention to the four vents on the roof from which white Zyklon-B pellets were poured.

We got into a car and drove a few kilometres to Birkenau, the vast killing centre adjacent to the peaceful village of Brzezinka.

Birkenau, with its maze of wooden barracks and ruins of crematoria, is nothing less than surreal, an open-air museum documenting the dark underbelly of human nature.

With the Red Army advancing on the camp, the Nazis dynamited the crematoria. They are now a heap of blasted bricks, ashen rocks and twisted metal, testaments of astonishingly warped minds.

Next to a shattered crematorium was a small pond, which, I was told, is saturated with human ashes. Pensive visitors crowded around it. I bent down to examine white specks scattered on the ground.

The guide said they were hard-packed human remains.

The wooded area bordering the crematoria was reminiscent of a well-tended nature reserve. As I walked along a shady path opposite long abandoned and crumbling sewage plants, I heard the insistent chirping of birds. The sweet sounds were incongruous, totally at odds with the unprecedented crimes that were perpetrated here.

Beyond the sewage plants, amid a line of trees, was "Canada," the network of warehouses to which the belongings of the victims were consigned. The Nazis set fire to "Canada" in 1945, leaving only the foundations.

I went into a barrack. Its three-tier bunk beds accommodated as many as 700 people at one time. The overpowering whiff of disinfectant and varnish impregnated the air.

Trudging back to the car, I paused at the infamous rail-line ramp where the capricious "selections" of Jews took place.

Hard as it was to grasp, the fate of my older brother was coldly determined here. Life itself hung in the balance here.

The centre of Oswiecim

Before driving back to Krakow, some 50 kilometres to the west, I stopped in Oswiecim, a clean, pleasant town of 46,000 near the camp.

In 1939, Jews comprised more than half of its population. Many were murdered in Auschwitz. The last Jewish resident of Oswiecim, Szymon Kluger, died nine years ago.

Nineteen of the town's 20 synagogues were destroyed by the Germans. They converted the last remaining shul into a munitions warehouse.

After the war, Jewish survivors held services in it. When they left Oswiecim some years later, the building was nationalized and used as a carpet store.

Nine years ago, the shul and two adjoining private Jewish homes were fused to form an educational and cultural facility, the Auschwitz Jewish Center. Adorned with nostalgic photographs and artifacts, it resurrects a bygone era, a lost world.

As a brochure states, "Before Auschwitz became the ultimate symbol of the Holocaust, it was just an ordinary Polish town known as Oswiecim."

Negev Dinner honours Elizabeth, Tony Comper

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Elizabeth and Tony Comper, honorees at the 2009 Jewish National Fund's (JNF) annual Negev Dinner in Toronto, are role models individually and as a couple.

The 61st Annual Negev Dinner will take place Nov. 29 at The Fairmont Royal York Hotel.

The Compers have made significant contributions to all segments of the community, especially in their commitment to eliminating discrimination.

In 2005, they founded FAST (Fighting Anti-Semitism Together), a coalition of non-Jewish business leaders who work to make the world a better, safer place for children.

After 38 years of marriage, they are clearly supportive of each another, as was evident in a recent interview.

They chose to have funds raised by the Negev Dinner campaign go to establish the Tony and Elizabeth Comper MAOF Environmental Experience. MAOF (the Hebrew word for flight and vision) is geared toward young immigrants and youth in underprivileged and peripheral areas of Israel. The educational program will teach about ecology and Zionism.

In an interview with the Compers in Tony's office in downtown Toronto, Elizabeth Comper said she had never met a Jewish person when she was growing up in Etobicoke.

"When we got married, we moved to Montreal and I worked in a Jewish day school," she said. They faced anti-Semitism there, she added, noting the burning of a Jewish school and other forms of discrimination and bigotry. "We had to take action. We had to get involved when we saw how frightened the young people were. I couldn't let it go."

She was involved in her first major fundraising initiative 22 years ago after she and her husband returned to Toronto, she said. She was approached by Robert Wong, who is active in the Chinese community. He asked her to help them build a home for seniors, "using Baycrest Centre as a model." The Compers still remain active with the Yee Hong Centre for Geriatric Care.

"I had never done corporate fundraising," Elizabeth Comper said, "but I thought of the generations of Chinese mothers who work two and three jobs. I needed a human connection."

Tony Comper joined BMO (Bank of Montreal) in 1967 and worked in virtually all of the bank's major operating areas. He was appointed CEO of the BMO Financial Group in 1999 and served as chair until May 2004, when the bank moved to a non-executive model. Recently retired, he retains an office at BMO.

He is the director of numerous corporations and organizations including Canadian Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, is past chair of the University of Toronto's governing council, former vice-chair of St. Michael's Hospital, and on the board of governors of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews.

The Compers have received numerous awards. The couple were honoured by Haifa University and received the Scopus Award from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. As a result of the initiatives of FAST, which was developed in partnership with the Canadian Jewish Congress charities committee for students in grades 6, 7 and 8, Elizabeth Comper noted that 500,000 students in public and private schools have been involved in the program and there are plans to expand the program.

Growing Up Bielski

For three years during the Holocaust, Ruth Bielski Ehrreich's father, Tuvia, and his brothers kept 1,200 Jews safe in the forests of Belarus as Nazi soldiers hunted them down, documented in the blockbuster movie, Defiance. The rough-and-tumble Bielski brothers came from a different world than their middle-class protectees, but they managed to create a sense of community and humanity and to keep it alive through bitter Belarusian winters. It's a story of the enduring power of the human spirit.

In tonight's lecture, Ms. Bielski will share her personal views of her family, of the film and, overall, on the power of defiance and resistance.

If you are a Bielski survivor, if you survived in a forest during the Holocaust, if you were a Partisan or Resistance Fighter or if you are a Holocaust survivor, call Mark Freedman at 416.635.2883 x 5219. We will have a special reserved section for you. Please arrive early in your uniform and decorations, and identify yourself to an usher.

The public does not need to register; this program is free and open to all. Reception to follow.

This program has been generously sponsored by the Bresler family, in memory of their family members who were murdered in the Holocaust, and in memory of all victims of the Shoah. Tonight, the Bresler family honours all who defied National Socialism and its tyranny.

The reception has been generously sponsored by the Gottesman family, in memory of Carol and Herman Gottesman.

British MP combats anti-Semitism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Anti-Semitism is an enduring phenomenon and must be constantly fought, says a British parliamentarian and author of a new book on the subject.

"Anti-Semitism won't disappear, anymore than racism will vanish," Denis MacShane said in an interview in Toronto last week. "But fighting it is always worthwhile, because it causes great damage to peace and democracy."

Describing it as a "powerful, virulent and destructive ideology," MacShane – a 61-year-old Labour party MP and former cabinet minister – warned that classical European-based anti-Semitism has merged with Islamist anti-Semitism in recent years.

Denis MacShane

Arguing that Islamism, or Islamic radicalism, is antithetical to universal liberal values, MacShane said that this particular form of anti-Semitism is officially sanctioned by two Muslim states, Iran and Saudi Arabia. The Iranian government threatens Israel's existence and denies the Holocaust, while Saudi Arabia propagates Wahhabism, a highly developed kind of anti-Semitism.

A former journalist and trade unionist who represents the constituency of Rotherham in west Yorkshire, he elaborates on these ideas in Globalising Hatred: The New Antisemitism, published in London recently by Weidenfeld & Nicolson.

According to MacShane, Islamist anti-Semitism has become a force to eradicate Jewishness from the Middle East and weaken and undermine humanist values of rule of law, tolerance and respect for human rights.

The book is a spinoff of MacShane's work in chairing the All Party Parliamentary Inquiry Into Anti-Semitism, which was commissioned in 2005 and was the first committee of its kind in British history.

Releasing a 60-page report a year later, the committee found a "pattern of fear" in Britain's Jewish community after synagogues were attacked, schoolboys were jostled on public transportation and rabbis were punched and knifed.

It also detected "an anti-Jewish discourse" in mood and tone whenever Jews were discussed.

The committee urged the police to upgrade the documentation of anti-Semitic incidents and asked the government to improve education about anti-Semitism in schools, crack down on anti-Jewish activity on university campuses and prevent the spread of anti-Semitic material online.

The recommendations were accepted by the prime minister of the day, Tony Blair, noted MacShane. "To Britain's credit, the Blair administration produced a formal response setting out tough new guidelines for the police to investigate anti-Semitic attacks and for universities to stop anti-Jewish ideology from taking root on campuses."

MacShane, the minister of state for Europe from 2002 to 2005, called anti-Semitism "the canary in the coal mine that tells us something is going seriously wrong." Citing current and disturbing examples of anti-Semitism outside Britain, he mentioned two cases.

A major Swedish daily published a report alleging that Israeli soldiers harvested Palestinian body parts. "This is a reference back to medieval anti-Semitism," said MacShane, whose brief visit to Toronto was under the auspices of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy.

As well, an important Spanish newspaper carried an interview with convicted Holocaust denier David Irving as part of its coverage of the 70th anniversary of the outbreak of World War II. "What possessed the editor to select Irving?" MacShane asked.

In general, MacShane is working to ensure that anti-Semitism does not become a component of the public policy of nations. But to his regret, the president of Iran, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, sanctions anti-Semitism by calling for Israel's destruction and denying the Holocaust, while Hamas and Hezbollah enshrine anti-Semitism in their respective charters.

"My interest in anti-Semitism stems from my interest in fascism, communism, racism and South African-style apartheid," explained MacShane, whose mother, Isobel MacShane, was Irish and whose father, Jan Matyjaszek, was Polish.

An Oxford University graduate who earned a PhD in international economics from the University of London, he worked for the British Broadcasting Corporation as a journalist and changed his surname at its request.

A former president of the National Union of Journalists, he was also policy director of the International Metal Workers' Federation. In 1982, he was arrested for attending a Solidarity trade union demonstration in Poland.

Representing a working-class riding in a steel- and coal-producing region, he has been an MP since 1994. There are 10,000 Muslims in Rotherham, but apparently no Jews, as far as he knows. "It's a part of England where Jews historically did not settle."

Although a Catholic, MacShane – who calls himself "Jew blind" – has been the butt of anti-Semitism. Detractors have accused him of being a "secret Jew," while anti-Semites have sent him nasty text messages.

But MacShane remains undeterred and unruffled, having recently accepted a job as chair of a think tank on anti-Semitism associated with the European Institute for the Study of Contemporary Anti-Semitism.

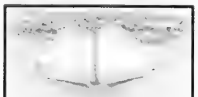
Noahide Code requires Schalit's release

By RABBI SHALOM SPIRA

The recently released and widely publicized two-minute video recording of captured Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit calls attention to a sacrosanct obligation of the Noahide Code – the seven universal laws decreed by God to the children of Noah – that requires Schalit's captors, the Mujahideen of the al-Qassam Brigades, to immediately release him.



Rabbinic Reflections

Maimonides, the eminent 12th-century scholar, rules in his Mishneh Torah that the Noahide Code prohibits the kidnapping of any human being, Jew or non-Jew. Moreover, writes Maimonides, the Noahide Code obligates every member of society to bring to justice those who are guilty of infractions of the Noahide Code, including the crime of kidnapping. For this reason, he continues, the entire city of Shechem (today called Nablus), as recorded in Genesis, was legally culpable for the abduction of Dinah, Jacob's daughter, by the city's prince.

Thus, not only are Schalit's captors in violation of the Noahide laws, but all their accomplices and the people who wield influence with them are, too, for not even trying to facilitate Schalit's release. The situation is analogous to that of kidnapped Dinah and the population of Shechem.

Nachmanides, the eminent 13th-century scholar, differs from Maimonides in terms of the culpability of the people of Shechem for Dinah's kidnapping. Nachmanides suggested that the townspeople didn't need to risk their lives to save Dinah in order to uphold the Noahide laws. According to Nachmanides, the people of Shechem were innocent of the abduction of Dinah. They were, however, guilty of many other violations of the Noahide laws.

Thus, for Nachmanides, the acquaintances of Schalit's captors who perceive a threat to their own lives in trying to liberate the soldier cannot be held accountable for Schalit's abduction.

But even Nachmanides agrees that the captors themselves are culpable for the abduction and are, therefore, required by the Noahide Code to immediately and unconditionally release Schalit.

The sole objection that Schalit's Mujahideen captors could raise to the application of the Noahide laws is that since it's now well publicized that the Israel Defence Forces knows where Schalit is, they have reason to fear that they will be killed by the IDF as soon as Schalit is freed. Thus, in an ironic twist, the Mujahideen believe they must now keep Schalit in captivity for their own personal survival.

This "excuse" can be overcome by the assignment of a neutral third party whom no one would harm – such as U.S. President Barack Obama – to be present when Schalit is handed back to Israel.

There are no excuses that justify the holding of Schalit. The Mujahideen are absolutely obligated under the Noahide Code to immediately release him while allowing only for the time necessary to arrange the logistics of this transfer.

On the video, Schalit says in Hebrew, "Ani rotzeh lomar lachem she'ani margish tov mibchinah briutit, viha-Mujahideen mi-brigadei al-Qassam mit'yachasim elai metzuyan." – "I want to tell you that I feel well in medical terms, and that the Mujahideen from the al-Qassam Brigades are treating me excellently."

Schalit's statement, however, as comforting as it may be, is totally irrelevant to the legal issue at hand. Dinah was also treated well by the prince of Shechem, and yet the prince was still obligated by virtue of the Noahide Code to immediately release her.

It's time for Schalit's captors to face up to their obligations under the Noahide laws and immediately free Schalit. That is the law. Obedience to the law will be a source of blessing to all humanity.

Character — where is it?

When I was in the eighth grade – years and years ago – a teacher I remember tacked the following message on a bulletin board: "When wealth is lost, nothing basic is lost. When health is lost, something important is lost. But when character is lost, all is lost."

Bookmarks
Bernard Baskin

At that time, these words had little meaning for me or my fellow students. Actually, Horace Greeley, the 19th-century American journalist and political leader, said it better: "Fame is a vapour, popularity an accident, riches take wing. Only one thing endures and that is character."

In my twilight years, I am disconcerted and dismayed that character, defined in my dictionary as "the combined moral and ethical structure of a person or group" has become a lost or abandoned virtue. The media is unremitting in their daily disclosure of villainy and corruption. Who isn't guilty? Politicians, clergymen, financiers, lawyers, teachers, heads of state, men and women in position of trust and responsibility succumb to the evils of greed, envy, lust, graft, etc. Chicanery, fraud, double-dealing seem to be everywhere.

Illegal drugs to enhance performance are widespread among personalities in the world of sport and entertainment. Crestfallen young fans discover that their heroes have feet of clay. Every day we are deluged with accounts of crime and wrongdoing: murder, arson, sexual assaults, Ponzi schemes, swarming incidents, honour killings and corporate malfeasance ad nauseam.

The news that a group of rabbis and politicians have been caught in a web of money laundering and corruption is a source of deep regret and unhappiness. Rabbi Moshe Rosenberg, Orthodox spiritual leader of a congregation in Kew Gardens Hills, N.Y., has written: "Imagine taking tzedakah, the vehicle of redemption, and turning it into a façade for criminal enterprise."

According to the Mishnah, someone who says, "I shall sin but at Yom Kippur will atone," forfeits the atonement accorded by the holy day. Our religious leaders must take the lead in being circumspect, since their behaviour is the most likely to be magnified in the media. They must not engage in any business dealings that are less than glatt kosher and nothing questionable whatsoever must adhere to them.

To develop character is a long and arduous struggle. Goethe, the 19th-century German philosopher and poet, wrote that we have to mould and hammer and forge ourselves into character. It's a distant goal to which there is no shortcut. It's the sum total of all the little decisions, the small deeds that are daily reactions to the choices that confront us. It's not inherited, nor is it an appendage of birth, wealth, talent or station. It is a result of one's own endeavours.

How can we overcome the widespread spiritual corrosion that is eating away at the vitals of our society? There was a time when character and religion walked hand in hand. Religious teachings reinforced ethical behaviour. But in the past generation, the influence of religion in the western world has waned. In the recent book The Evolution of God, Robert Wright, who has taught philosophy at Princeton University and religion at the University of Pennsylvania, writes: "In modern intellectual circles, speculating seriously about God's existence isn't a path to widespread esteem."

Yet, he points out, that for the believer there is a moral axis around which to organize one's life, and that this axis emphasizes such values as the sacredness of human life, truth, honesty and integrity. Perhaps the God for our time is best worshipped through Godliness, that is, the God who proclaims: "Seek justice, relieve the oppressed, defend the orphan, plead for the widow." Not the qualities of divinity, but the divinity of the qualities is necessary for belief.

Perhaps the words of the prophet Jeremiah remain our best guide for the achievement of character: "Thus says the Eternal One: let not the wise glory in their wisdom, let not the mighty glory in their might, let not the rich glory in their riches; but let those who glory, glory in this… that I am the power that makes for love, justice and righteousness on earth, for in these things I delight."

Getting at the truth takes work

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Through the relatively trivial – film festival tiffs and the Sid Ryan express to the existentially alarming spectre of Iranian missiles and Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's end game, there is a feeling in the air that the winds have shifted. As Prof. Simon Schama, one of the world's foremost historians, noted in a 2003 interview, "the line that's being crossed is actually from an attack on what Israel does to an attack on what Israel is. And of course if the Jews would do the whole world a favour by disappearing entirely… then I expect there wouldn't be any anti-Semitism, although as one of my colleagues reminded me, it didn't stop there being Japanese anti-Semitism."

As has been commented upon endlessly, Israel is the complex flashpoint for much of the critical rhetoric being flung about these days, and much of it comes from Jews themselves. Jennifer Loewenstein, associate director of the Middle East studies program at the University of Wisconsin, writes that "the destruction of Gaza has nothing to do with Hamas. Israel will accept no authority in the Palestinian territories that it does not ultimately control." Or consider this from her fellow member of the tribe, Naomi Klein: "It's time. Long past time. The best strategy to end the increasingly bloody occupation is for Israel to become the target of the kind of the global movement that put an end to apartheid in South Africa." And Israeli journalist Gideon Levy has argued in columns for Ha'aretz that "Israel is a dangerous and violent country, devoid of all restraints and blatantly ignoring the resolutions of the United Nations Security Council, while not giving a hoot about international law."

All of this creates mounting pressure for Jewish students to separate fact from fiction, legitimate criticism from dangerous and even racist distortion, historical truth from clever propaganda. As U.S. president John Adams famously noted, "facts are stubborn things." Getting them right takes time, and an ability to assess rationally and patiently. In the wake of recent battles against Hezbollah and Hamas, Israeli policy has been the subject of constant debate in the media and the world community.

On the evening of Nov. 7 in Toronto, at Torah in Motion's eighth annual "Renewing Our Spirit Conference," I will be conducting a dialogue with Prof. Michael Walzer of Princeton University, the world's leading theorist on just war; MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler, renowned for his work on human rights across the globe; and Bret Stephens, former editor of the Jerusalem Post and currently head of the foreign bureau of the Wall Street Journal. We will discuss the following questions: What is the line between a "just war" and an unethical military campaign? What is the nature of human rights in the midst of war? What does "proportionality" mean in an armed conflict and how large a role should "innocent civilians play" in composing military strategy? How can one discern between legitimate criticism of Israel and anti-Semitism? Is the media preoccupied with Israeli actions at the expense of focusing on violence and human rights abuses carried out by other states? How should Israel and the West respond to Iran? How large a role do settlements play in the ultimate disposition of peace in the Middle East? Does the fact that Israel is a Jewish state mean that it must abide by different moral rules than other countries?

Judaism & organ donation

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

Last week we looked at the low rate of organ transplantation in Israel and the road to legislation that aims to respect Judaism's value of preserving life without risking the desecration of a body or the hastening of death in order to be able to harvest organs. Today, how various streams of Judaism are grappling with this issue.

The Halachic Organ Donor Society has the most interesting website I came across on this issue, starting with its mission statement: "To save lives by encouraging organ donation from Jews to the general population (including gentiles) by educating them about the halachic and medical issues concerning organ donation." The trilingual site (English, Hebrew, Spanish) includes testimonial videos from rabbis, including one from a rabbi who died while waiting for a kidney. There is information about conducting one-day seminars, along with emergency phone numbers. [hods.org]

The Toronto Board of Rabbis has produced a brochure with 19 smiling faces below the headline, "We've signed our organ donor cards. Have you?" The text continues, "We believe in the Divine mandate to save life – an obligation first expressed in the Torah itself: 'You shall not stand idly by the blood of your neighbour.' (Leviticus 19:16) We see organ donation as a new means to fulfil an ancient, eternal religious duty." [bit.ly/jdon09]

The Rabbinical Assembly's 16-page Jewish Medical Directives for Health Care includes two forms that deal with end-of-life issues. In regard to organ donation, four alternatives are presented ranging from "when I die, any or all of my vital organs and other body parts be donated for the purpose of transplantation" to "I do not wish that any part of my body be used for purpose of transplantation." [bit.ly/jdon14] For more on the Conservative movement's views on organ donation, Rabbi Joel Roth's responsum examines the use of artificial limbs, animal organs, and human blood, bone marrow and kidney donations. [bit.ly/jdon15]

I was not able to find a detailed online analysis of the permissibility of organ donation by Agudath Israel of America, aside from Rabbi Avi Shafran pointing out that there isn't unanimity on the issue [bit.ly/jdon10] and advising consulting a rabbi due to the complexity of the matter. [bit.ly/jdon11]

Agudath Israel has published a template for a "Halachic Living Will," which includes the following text: "Subject to certain limited exceptions, Jewish law generally prohibits the performance of any autopsy or dissection. It is my wish that Jewish law and custom be followed with respect to such procedures, and with respect to all other post-mortem matters, including the removal and usage of any of my body organs or tissue for transplantation or any other purposes." [bit.ly/jdon12]

Writing in the Forward, Elaine Berg of the New York Organ Donor Network, quotes Rabbi Moshe Tendler, a professor of medical ethics at Yeshiva University. "The often-repeated query, 'Is it really permissible to desecrate the dead by removing their organs?' is answered by the undisputed affirmation that the saving of a life takes precedence over all other ritual concerns." [bit.ly/jdon13]

A look at the importance of organ donation wouldn't be complete without acknowledging its impact on individual lives. "On Sept. 29, 2005, just after her birthday, at the start of the Jewish year, my mom received the gift of life, a second birthday in the form of a kidney transplant. She had been sick for some time and had begun dialysis six months prior. On a fateful September day, while she was at a dialysis treatment, she was informed that a kidney donor had been found. We were shocked and overjoyed. The kidney and blood type were a perfect match. We were told by the transplant coordinator that this was like winning the lottery. On Sept. 24, 2006, my mother, Sara, turned 60 years old." A website has been up since then to wish Sara a happy birthday and raise awareness about organ donation. [HappyBirthdaySara.org.]

After 20,000 deliveries, baby doctor to be honoured

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Dr. Bernard Ludwig delivered some 20,000 babies during the more than half a century he practised medicine in Toronto.

He will be honoured by the Canadian Friends of Herzog Hospital Ezrath Nashim Jerusalem at a concert and silent auction on Monday, Nov. 9, at the City Playhouse in Thornhill, Ont.

The Dr. Bernard Ludwig Scholarship for the Nurses' Aides Training Program for Ethiopian Immigrants will be established at the hospital, which was founded in 1895 and is now the foremost geriatric and psychiatric hospital in Israel.

Ludwig says that over the years, he has worked closely with nurses in the delivery room.

"A nurse is a very good helper to a doctor, and if nurses are trained, they are a very important part of obstetrics," he said.

He added he is pleased that the Herzog scholarship for Ethiopian immigrants will help many poor people in Jerusalem. The scholarship will also train midwives.

He said that in medicine, and particularly in obstetrics, there have been great advances, such as computers that can track a baby's heart from home and ultrasound, which can detect abnormalities in the placenta.

Ludwig, 87, graduated from the University of Toronto in 1945 and pursued his specialty in obstetrics and gynecology in the United States. After serving in the Canadian Army Medical Corps, he began his obstetrical practice in 1950 at the original Mount Sinai Hospital on Yorkville Avenue in Toronto, when the delivery area was one room, divided in two.

Over the half century he practised medicine, there were many times that he slept at Mount Sinai while a patient was in labour. "I hadn't been on vacation for 20 years, and there was a period of time that I hadn't been to our cottage near Peterborough for 10 years," he said.

"Many times, since I slept at the hospital, I would be awakened by other specialists to assist with their deliveries."

He has been honoured with the creation of the Bernard Ludwig Fellowship in Maternal/Fetal Medicine at Mount Sinai Hospital and has received an award from ECHO - The Joseph Tenenbaum National Jewish Institute for Health.

Dr. Bernard Ludwig

"I've had an unusual career," Ludwig said. "Our life has been disturbed between the demands on my schedule and my wife's artistic career." His wife, Margaret Florence, is an acclaimed painter and sculptor. The Ludwigs have four children and 13 grandchildren.

Dr. Dorothy Pullan, who is co-chairing the Herzog event with Miriam Frankel, told The CJN that the medical and research centre at Herzog Hospital is recognized for its research in behavioural genetics including work in Alzheimer's, Parkinson's disease, epilepsy, eating disorders, addiction, attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD) and schizophrenia.

Pullan said that the hospital treats child and adult victims of terror attacks, war and domestic violence.

The Herzog Hospital fundraising event will feature the vocal group Cadence. Both of Cadence's Juno-nominated albums have met with wide critical acclaim.

For more information about the concert and silent auction, call 416-256-4222 or fax 416-256-1446.

SACH fundraiser to aid children who require lifesaving heart surgery

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The organizers of an upcoming kids concert hope to raise awareness about an Israeli non-profit organization, and help save children's lives with the funds raised.

On Nov. 1, volunteers with the Toronto chapter of Save a Child's Heart (SACH) – a charity that raises funds to perform free lifesaving heart surgery on children from developing countries – will be holding a sold-out concert for kids called Sing Your Heart Out.

About 350 people are expected to come to Beth Sholom Synagogue next month to enjoy performances from kids bands Sonshine, and Broccoli and the Shimmy Shakers.

Every dollar raised at the event, which is sponsored by Spin Master, a toy company, will go towards SACH, which aims to train medical personnel in less developed countries to provide needed treatment in their own environment.

But until that goal is achieved, Israeli doctors donate their time to perform surgery on children with congenital heart problems.

SACH has an agreement with the Wolfson Medical Center in Holon, a suburb of Tel Aviv, that permits the organization to use all the facilities of the hospital, provided that they are able to raise the $10,000 it costs to perform the surgery on each patient.

Sari Goldman, a SACH volunteer and chair of the concert, said she was thrilled to learn that the show sold out two weeks early and that they managed to raise enough funds – more than $10,000 – to cover the cost of a child's heart surgery.

Goldman, who headed the committee of 12 women – all young Jewish mothers on maternity leave – were looking to do something worthwhile with their time off from work to help those in need.

"Because we're new moms, we understand a little bit more what it might be like to have a sick child and our hearts go out to those parents," she said.

"Instead of just going for lunch or going to a music class, we meet all the time with great ideas, and the networking between these 12 women is incredible. I think the entire Jewish community now knows about this concert."

Goldman added that there have been a number of events that SACH has put together over the past 1 1/2 years to raise funds and awareness, but none of those events have targeted this specific age group – young families with children between the ages of two and eight.

"We thought this would be a great way to engage the community," she said.

The concert, which she hopes will become an annual event, is a one hour show in the afternoon on a Sunday at 3:30 pm.

"It's after nap time. We're trying to be sensitive to parents' needs," Goldman said.

"It's an engaging concert. They will not be in theatre style seats. They're going to be on the floor dancing, we're going to have maracas and stuff like that."

For parents who can make it to the synagogue an hour earlier, their kids will be treated to a face-painting station, and a guitar circle led by Mark Weinstock.

SACH Canada president Karen Diamond said that it makes sense for the organization to be hosting a children's concert because SACH "touches the hearts of children and families.

"We are trying to target different demographics to raise awareness and funds and trying to do it in a way that people enjoy themselves and learn about the organization so that they will be ambassadors for Save a Child's Heart."

Diamond added that what makes SACH so special is that while it saves lives, it also works to build bridges between religions and cultures, and shows Israel in a positive light.

"Save a Child's Heart really puts Israel out there on the world stage and shows the world what Israel has contributed in terms of science, in terms of humanitarian philosophy, medically, technologically – this organization satisfies all of that," Diamond said.

"It is completely non-political, non-denominational, as almost 50 per cent of the kids are immediate neighbours of Israel – there are Palestinian kids – and the other 50 per cent come from other underdeveloped areas."

Diamond said she is inspired by the fact that young people are also getting into the spirit of spreading the word about the cause.

Her niece, Laura Diamond, chose to have the guests at her bat mitzvah donate to SACH in lieu of gifts. She donated $14,000.

Diamond said that because the organization is small, every dollar is accounted for and goes towards covering the cost of a surgery.

"People feel the impact of their dollars... It's tangible," she said.

"This motivated [my niece] to do something more – she and her girlfriends designed greeting cards, with a blurb about Save a Child's Heart on the back of each card as well as the name and age of the child who designed the card."

She and her friends came up with eight designs and they sold the cards through their networks of family and friends. They also plan to sell them at the Nov. 1 concert.

"Not only are they raising money, but every time someone uses these cards, it goes into a home where the people read about SACH."

People with flu symptoms urged to stay home

Rabbi Martin Berman of Shaar Shalom Synagogue expressed the same concern. On Shmini Atzeret, Oct. 10, handshaking was discontinued during the Torah procession, when the Torah is carried around the synagogue. Instead, smiles, greetings and nods have replaced the handshake, he said.

"It's reasonable with large groups of people that we take at least some minimal precautions," Rabbi Berman said. "As the flu season gets worse, we may have to get more strict."

Rabbi Martin Berman

Synagogues, like many other institutions, now commonly provide alcohol-based hand sanitizers, sometimes in multiple locations.

H1N1 is spread when an infected person coughs or sneezes and germs enter the nose, eyes, or throat of another person, according to the Public Health Agency of Canada's website.

Germs can also rest on hard surfaces and be picked up on hands, then transmitted to the respiratory system by touching the mouth or nose.

According to the agency, H1N1 "has caused primarily mild illness in Canada, but Canadians need to be prepared to respond to a potentially more severe form of the virus that may emerge this fall."

At Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, ritual director Michael Rubin announced its new H1N1-related policy on the same day a similar announcement was made at Shaar Shalom. He asked congregants not to take it as an affront if clergy don't shake their hands.

Five days later, at Beth David's Thursday morning service last week, Ted Cohen appeared bemused after receiving an aliyah to the Torah.

"I don't know whether to shake or elbow," he said.

Initial elbow bumps he received, accompanied by congratulatory wishes of "yasher koach," gave way to more familiar handshakes as he made his way to the back of the chapel.

"Like any habit, it takes a while," said Rubin. "People are getting used to it. Most people said it makes sense."

Rubin admitted to missing the handshakes. "You want to have that contact with people. Hopefully it will just be a temporary measure."

The synagogue's Shabbat bulletin now includes a notice, based on Public Health recommendations, advising people to wash hands frequently and thoroughly with soap and hot water or with an alcohol-based hand sanitizer; to sneeze or cough into a sleeve or arm if a tissue is not available, and to stay home when ill with flu-like symptoms.

H1N1 is a respiratory illness that almost always causes cough and fever. Other common symptoms are fatigue, muscle aches, sore throat, headache, decreased appetite and runny nose, and sometimes nausea, vomiting and diarrhea.

At Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, Rabbi Chaim Strauchler spoke from the pulpit before the High Holidays requesting that people with flu symptoms stay home and advising them that in such cases, the synagogue would arrange to have someone blow the shofar for them at home.

He also emphasized that even though "washing for pleasure" is prohibited on Yom Kippur, when there is the possibility of contagion, such as after people sneeze or cough into their hands, they are required to wash them.

Although handshaking is "very much part of the culture" at the synagogue, Rabbi Strauchler has noticed that some people have started using alternatives including "sleeve pulls" or taking hold of the other person's forearm.

"Judaism requires us to look after our health," he said.

A message to ba'alei tshuvah

By MICHAEL ISENBERG
CJN Intern

Michael Isenberg

Family feuds occur in many homes and the biggest problems seem to arise around religion.

When a Jewish child decides to leave an unobservant lifestyle for Orthodoxy, a verbal brawl between the black sheep of the family and everyone else often ensues.

Being such a child, I would know.

I'm known as a ba'al tshuvah, a person who is becoming more religious. Over the past five years, since I was 16, I've grown spiritually and intellectually through my Jewish studies and observance.

Friends and family have commented on how much more of a loving and sensitive person I've become, working hard but living in tranquility. But none of it would be true if I had continued on the path of intolerance for non-observing Jews with which I began my growth.

Too often, ba'alei tshuvah get caught up in the excitement of their new-found meaning in life, leaving behind entirely the world they once knew.

This only isolates the individual and strengthens others' stereotypes about "crazy" Orthodox people who think they're superior to the rest of mankind.

Guest Voice

Sadly, I learned this the hard way.

When I started growing, I felt I could no longer live in my parents' home. It wasn't kosher. It wasn't shomer Shabbat.

And there were, God forbid, televisions!

I did what any good, newly observant Jew would do: I stayed away from home as much as I could.

I felt I wasn't getting spiritually uplifted if I wasn't at my religious friends' homes for Shabbat. I came home to sleep, but mostly, I would just sleep out.

Big mistake.

My parents' hearts were shattered. They felt I had abandoned them and my two younger siblings, who were both used to looking at me as a role model.

I embarrassed my family, as if I had said, "Thanks for supporting me for 16 years. I'm out of here, suckers!"

It also bothered me that my family wasn't religious. I had discovered something incredible – something that I believed gives purpose and meaning to life – and I wanted to share it with others.

So the few times that I was around the house, I preached.

No, actually, I dictated. I imposed, or at least tried to kosher the house or discuss a Torah class I had heard.

Another big mistake.

My family was hurt by my absence from our house. And when I was around, they were angered by me acting as if they were worthless for not living a Torah lifestyle.

I didn't consider them any less Jewish.

But everything I was doing was the antithesis of Orthodox Judaism.

The secret to avoiding strife between Jews of any stream and to establishing working, loving relationships is simple and painfully obvious. In the words of one of my rabbis: be normal.

After he literally slapped me across the head, he told me that the problems I was having with my family were a direct result of my actions.

The fatal error that ba'alei tshuvah make – one I've seen too many times – is assuming their families are unwilling to accept a religious child.

But parents only seem uninterested in helping because they have negative stereotypes embedded in their minds.

If a child becomes a vegetarian, even if his or her parents disagrees with vegetarianism, they'd surely accommodate their child so long as he or she was respectful.

Parents want to help. I would know. Mine did.

But they're only going to help when they see that their kids are calm, rational and accepting.

The same rabbi who knocked some sense into me also taught me about the concept of shalom bayit, peace in the home.

He said, for example, that if my parents want to eat right when Shabbat starts but I want to go to shul because it gives me a spiritual experience, that I should daven at home and eat with my family. The spirituality and well-being of the collective is much more important than the individual.

He told me to be myself, the same joke-telling goof at the dinner table I used to be. When everyone enjoys a Friday night dinner, the essence of Shabbat and Judaism is truly felt.

There are times when I can't compromise. I won't break kashrut laws, for instance, but if davening without a minyan means spending time with my father who needs me around, so be it.

After a year of nearly losing my family, my parents saw that I was making strides to repair the damage. I would stay at home on Shabbat, even though we didn't say the blessings at dinner to my liking and the TV was on.

I would miss a Torah class to go to a Toronto Raptors game with my father, the only time we had to spend together.

Over the past three years especially, my willingness to accommodate my family has been reciprocated.

Family, friends and simchah are what give true meaning to life

We now have shomer Shabbat Friday nights and our basement kitchen is now kosher. We also build a sukkah and kasher the house for Passover together, as one family.

Last year, my parents purchased a condominium in Florida, and one of their requirements was that there be an Orthodox shul within walking-distance for the one time that I come down each year.

People, not Judaism, teach intolerance.

Judaism says love every Jew like you love yourself.

Family, friends and simchah are what give true meaning to life.

Israeli medical team saving lives in the Philippines

Donations to UJA Relief Fund assist IsraAid

By Daniel Horowitz

On September 26, Typhoon Ketsana - originally classified as a tropical storm - caused widespread damage in the Philippines, killing at least 700 people and affecting more than 1.8 million.

Officials estimate that 375,000 people were forced to abandon their homes and take refuge in evacuation centres due to the worst flooding the region has experienced in 40 years.

Ketsana also destroyed more than 180,000 tons of rice crops, a vital component of the Philippines' economy.

Immediately after the typhoon had struck, United Jewish Appeal established a Philippines Disaster Relief Fund, which has already raised approximately $25,000. Funds raised are assisting IsraAid - The Israel Forum for International Humanitarian Aid - which is currently on the ground in the affected area - coordinate relief efforts to aid the victims. The six-person medical team in the Philippines will be there for 16 days before another team will be sent to replace them.

The team is currently providing medical treatment, including general first aid, and treating diseases caused by the water, including diarrhea and other sicknesses. Earlier, IsraAid members also distributed food and clothing to the victims of Ketsana.

An Israeli doctor, part of the IsraAid team, examines a youth following Typhoon Ketsana.

"Entire neighborhoods were covered with water and abandoned," says head of the current IsraAid relief mission, Elad Seker. "Thousands were on the rooftops where they cook, sleep and live. I have a lot of search and rescue experience, but I have never seen anything like this. The need here is overwhelming. We opened a medical station and hundreds stood in line waiting for assistance. We are treating approximately 300 people a day, mostly women and children suffering from the most serious conditions."

IsraAid is a coalition of Israeli and Jewish NGOs operating in developing countries by offering relief, rehabilitation and long-term aid to communities in need. United Jewish Appeal has previously supported their work following the Peru Earthquake, on the border of Darfur, relief aid following the earthquake in Pakistan, relief aid to Katrina evacuees in New Orleans and aid to Somali camps in Kenya.

"Most amazing, when the people heard that we came all the way from Israel they greeted us with love and open arms," marvels Seker. "Everyone here is talking about the Israeli delegation. We hung the Israeli flag in the entrance of the clinic we opened and people stood in line to take a picture near it. There is such love for Israel among these people. Its not easy being here but the comments and gratification fill our hearts."

"In working with IsraAid to deliver this vital support, UJA not only is able to efficiently and effectively deliver aid rapidly to many of those in the disaster zone, we also help reveal the caring spirit and generous soul of the Israeli society to a troubled part of the world," says Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "The compassionate and generous donations we have received for this initiative should make us all proud as a community. It truly embodies the values of tzedakah and tikun olam."

CIC urges government action on Iran

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) is planning to rally Canadians to demand that politicians across party lines take action on the threat posed by Iran.

The CIC will host a day-long conference on Oct. 27 called "Democracy in Action – Crisis in Iran" in Ottawa. It will be highlighted by keynote speaker Nazanin Afshin-Jam, an Iranian-Canadian political activist who was Miss Canada 2003 and is the co-founder and president of Stop Child Executions.

She will discuss her experiences with Iranian human rights abuses and her organization's ongoing attempt to end the practice of child executions in her homeland.

Speaking to The CJN last week from Vancouver, Afshin-Jam had a specific message for Jews and pro-Israel advocates: the average Iranian doesn't hate Israel.

In fact, she said, grassroots sentiment in Iran is quite the opposite.

"I'm in regular contact with people in Iran. Generally, Iranians have no problem with Jews and the State of Israel," Afshin-Jam said. "Iranians want the world to know that [Iranian President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad does not speak for them on [the topics of] Israel or the U.S."

Nafshim-Jam added that it "bothers" Iranians that their president has made comments about destroying Israel and denying the Holocaust. She said that in her people's eyes, Israel has every right to exist as a Jewish state.

"The Iranian people want peace, freedom and human rights for Iran, Israel and the whole world," she said, adding that in her opinion, the international community must continue to pressure China and Russia to see Iran's current regime as the global threat it will become if it acquires nuclear weapons, and that U.S. President Barack Obama should stop negotiating softly with the "murderous thugs" and "messianic leaders" who rule Iran.

Nazanin Afshin-Jam

"We are the sons and daughters of Cyrus the Great, the founder of the Persian empire, who drafted the first declaration of human rights in the world. Cyrus issued the decree of liberation to the Jews and introduced laws to abolish slavery and protect the rights of religious minorities," Afshin-Jam wrote in an e-mail.

"The vast majority of Iranians would like to uphold these principles. They would like friendly relations with Jews in Israel and Americans alike. They simply want to be free from the stranglehold of this theocratic regime that suffocates their rights on a daily basis and to have a democratic system based on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. If Iran were ruled by the 'people of Iran' there would be no nuclear threat."

However, since that threat is now very real, the CIC believes Canadians and democracies everywhere need be concerned.

"Canada has demonstrated its capacity to be a model for the entire international community… it must play that role again," the CIC said in a statement last week, asking that all concerned Canadians band together to "mobilize political action against the human rights abuses of the Iranian regime and its nuclear agenda."

Other notable speakers scheduled for the conference include Iranian-Canadian lawyer and pro-democracy activist Sayeh Hassan; Liberal MP and human rights advocate Irwin Cotler; international security expert David B. Harris, and the CIC's CEO, Shimon Fogel.

Moshe Ronen, chair of the CIC, said the conference's main objective is to give Canadians information and tools to help them understand how their government can "lead the way" in containing Iran.

One of those tools would be the development of an "effective sanctions protocol to compel Iran towards full compliance with its treaty obligations and international law," he said.

"Our collective failure to address the threat posed by Iran will change the entire political and geo-strategic landscape… not only in the Middle East, but internationally. We have one last chance to get it right and this conference is dedicated to developing the understanding and political will to act now, while non-military options still offer the chance of reducing and eliminating the Iranian threat. That is why it is so important for us to create a platform for action," Ronen said.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has arranged for group flight rates to Ottawa to encourage interested Jewish community members and pro-Israel advocates to attend the conference. The CIC is hoping for a massive turnout.

UBC researcher studies Israelis in Vancouver

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — It's estimated that some 45,000 Israelis are living in Canada, a number that piqued the interest of Brent Harris a few years ago when he first heard it.

"Although I had grown up in the Canadian Jewish community, I had never encountered too many Israelis, and this led me to wonder how much the two communities intermingle," he said.

When it came time to choose a thesis topic for his master's degree in anthropology at the University of British Columbia, Harris, who hails from Kingston, Ont., decided to study Israelis in Canada – and specifically in Vancouver. He spent nine months observing Vancouver's Israeli community, conducting 34 in-depth interviews.

His recently completed thesis tackles two subjects: identity and integration, and the changing times and attitudes among Israeli migrants in Canada.

Harris estimates there are 2,000 Israelis living in Vancouver, and his interview subjects were aged 19 to 58.

"Among the Israelis I met in Vancouver, most have had success entering the labour market, but for some, their social integration has not come as easily," he said.

"Even after a number of years in Canada, some Israelis find it difficult to forge close friendships with Canadians including Canadian Jews – because of a difference in their styles of interaction."

His interviewees explained that Israelis tend to speak very directly, while Canadians often don't, making it difficult for Israelis to interpret what they really mean.

"Many of the Israelis I interviewed also found Canadians to be not as warm as fellow Israelis," Harris said.

Most of the Israelis Harris spoke with maintain a strong sense of Israeli identity, but they weren't as clear about their Canadian identity.

"While the majority are content with life in Canada, many do not express a strong feeling of being Canadian, and some even have difficulty pinpointing what exactly 'Canadian' means," he said.

"Interestingly, those who do feel some sense of Canadian identity are not necessarily the ones who have been here the longest or who have come at a younger age – this varies. What many Israelis do experience in Canada, however, is a greater awareness of themselves as Jews now that they live among a non-Jewish majority."

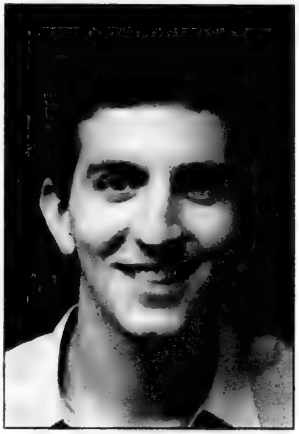
Some 30 years ago, Israelis who left Israel were plagued with guilt by their departure.

Termed veridah – which literally means going down, implying an immoral act – leaving Israel was denounced by the Israeli media back then, disparaging emigrants for abandoning the Jewish state.

But things have changed, and that feeling of guilt and stigmatization has lifted considerably, Harris found.

"There's a growing number of people in Israel who look favourably upon living abroad or acquiring a second citizenship. Consequently, many of the Israelis I met do not express strong feelings of guilt over having left Israel, and many are unsure whether they will return," he said.

"Most of my informants expressed no feelings of guilt over having left Israel, and of those who did, it was not a patriotic longing for the land or state, but rather, a longing for family and friends back home."



Brent Harris

Previous studies found that Israelis harbour a "myth of return," a continuously expressed desire to return to Israel and a reluctance to accept their stay abroad as permanent. Harris found that this myth isn't as strong today, and he suggests in his thesis that "these shifting attitudes are the product of a growing individualism in Israeli society."

What surprised him most about his findings were Israelis' accounts of the social barriers they say they face in their relationships with Canadian Jews. "Although many Israelis feel a connection to them as fellow Jews, they often find that Canadian Jews are decidedly Canadian in their mentality and style of interaction," he said.

"As a result, many of the social barriers they face with Canadian non-Jews – for example a lack of directness and a lack of warmth – they also face with Jews. Some of the Israelis I met have a sense that there are more cultural differences between them than the commonalities they share."

Owen Sound shul holds musical fundraiser

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Jewish community of Owen Sound, the smallest Canadian town with an active shul, is hoping that a concert fundraiser will help the Beth Ezekiel Synagogue continue to thrive.

On Oct. 25, Beth Ezekiel will host "Rhythm and Jews III: Everything's Coming Up Moses," a concert that will feature a variety of Jewish-themed music, including klezmer, in an effort to raise funds for a number of ongoing projects meant to improve the 63-year-old building, a site of historical significance under Ontario's Heritage Act.

In 2002, the congregation learned that the main beam supporting the sanctuary had rotted away and the floor was in danger of collapse. The cost of repairs was around $35,000.

At that point, the shul only had a membership of 15 families and the congregation faced a very real possibility that the historic building would have to close.

Later that year, the shul's past president, Jeff Elie, decided to hold a fundraising event, the first Rhythm and Jews concert, to invite the Owen Sound community inside the synagogue to experience Jewish tradition and culture.

The concert itself garnered less than $10,000, but as word spread that the synagogue was in danger of closing, the community raised $35,000 to repair it.

Since 2002, the congregation has grown to about 60 families, who live in Owen Sound as well as outlying areas, said Beth Ezekiel's vice-president, Gary Weinger.

"I think the fact that we were able to raise funds... brought a lot of the community members into the synagogue," said Weinger, who was born in Romania, grew up in Toronto and moved to Owen Sound, which now has a population of about 21,000, in the mid-1970s.

"They had been pretty reluctant to do it until then, and they were so willing to come and see who we were and look at the shul and come to the concert."

He added that today, most Jews in the area are affiliated with the synagogue.

"We make it really easy to belong to the shul. It's a small amount to join and we would rather have people join for a small amount and partake in things than not to include them," he said.

The purpose of the upcoming concert – in addition to celebrating 105 years of the Jewish community in Owen Sound and the Grey-Bruce region – is to raise funds to build a permanent home in Beth Ezekiel for an exhibit about the history of the shul that ran from 2006 until earlier this year at the Grey Roots Museum and Archives, a heritage centre.

The exhibit features background information, photos, clothing, artifacts, old prayer books and other items relevant to the history of the congregation.

Weinger said he also hopes some of the funds will go toward improving the synagogue's Hebrew school.

"We have a Hebrew school in the basement – I think the kids would prefer to call it a dungeon," he said. "There is space on the second floor that really needs a lot of work, and we're hoping to get the Hebrew school in a better situation because it is an important part [of the shul]."

Beth Ezekiel Synagogue in Owen Sound

The concert will feature a local klezmer band called the Gypsy Jive Band – of which Weinger is a member as a violinist – as well as a performance by Voyageur Storytelling, a husband-and-wife team who present Jewish tales and folklore, and Bobbi Nicholls, a rock, country, jazz and blues musician who will perform songs by Jewish composers and artists.

Chernick has recorded albums including Under the Canopy, a collection of Jewish love songs, released by the Huppah Project at the 2008 Ashkenaz Festival.

Concert-goers will also be treated to Jewish cuisine provided by the congregants.

"We'll have a ton of food there for people to taste. They'll get a taste of what Jewish cooking is – anything from latkes, to blintzes, to gefilte fish," he said.

Weinger added that although there will be two performances on Oct. 25, tickets are in high demand, since the synagogue can only accommodate about 90 people for each show.

He anticipates that many in the audience will be members of the non-Jewish community, since they have been very supportive of the shul's survival in the past.

"The major churches have been wonderful, and the leaders have been wonderful at making us feel part of the community," he said.

A Warrant for Genocide

Judge Hadassa Ben Itto

The Protocols of the Elders of Zion have been used to this day with malicious intent to demonize Jews and to delegitimize the State of Israel. How were they created? Who used them and for what purpose? Why did we not heed the warnings? How does this impact anti-Semitism today? What can be done - or is it too late?

חברי השוג יהודי פירנצקי כתב לי בתגובה את הדברים הבאים:

"בדרך כלל אני מסכים עם הדיעות שאתה מביא בטור, וגם הפעם היית צודק לו היה מדובר באיזב נורמאלי. אך הקליינטים איתם מתמודדת ישראל לא רק שמצצלים בתי ספר, בתי חולים ויעד מוסדות צבוריים כדי לפתוח באש על כוחות צה"ל בתקוה שחייל עברי יימצע מפגיעה במוסדות המכובדים. ואם בכל זאת תיפתח אש לעברם ואזרחים עיברי אורח תמימים ייהרגו- הרי זה משוכח כי מסדרונות האו"ם שורצים אוהבי יהודים אשר מצפים בקוצר רוח להזדמנות שבה יוכלו להפגין את אהבתם למדינת היהודים ומהיגיה. ואם מפקד בצה"ל יחלים לשובת חיילו על מתיחה באש לעבר חפים ממשע- אחריהם מסתתרים גיבורי המאס. ואני אישית לא אחשב ש"אהודי ישראל" באו"ם בריכים להדיר שינה מאיתנו. אחרי הכל גם אם לא נפגין מוסדות צבור ולא נטגע בעוברי אורח תמימים וחיילינו ייפגעו-הדו"ח שהאו"ם יגיש לאחר מכן לא יהיה שונה בהרבה".

נאוה סמל, ישראלית שורשית, אחותו של שלמה ארצי, משתפת איתנו במסעה אל עצמה תוך שהיא מגלה את בנה שהרחיק עד לאוסטראליה.
"איך הסיפור תפס אותי? איך הילד שלי הרחיק עד לתחתית העולם לחפור בשורשיו שורשיו ולנער את האדמה שהתקשתה סביבו, ובה בעת, איך אני מוצאת את עצמי עדרת את חלקת הזכרונות שלי".

Intermarriage can benefit Jews, Bronfman says

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Intermarriage is not necessarily such a bad thing, according to Edgar Bronfman Sr. In fact, he believes it can and is having a positive effect on modern Jewish life.

"I'm not advocating intermarriage. What I'm saying is that intermarriage is here. It's here to stay. Let's make it work for us, rather than against us," the former president of World Jewish Congress said in an Oct. 8 talk at McGill University.

The Montreal-born Bronfman, 80, suggested that the community should reach out to the intermarried and help them create Jewish homes, even if the non-Jewish partner does not formally convert.

"When I was 18 or 19, I was told my father would rend his clothes and sit shivah for me if I married out. I said that's all right, as long as he doesn't change the trust.

"I think those days are gone. Being Jewish is a choice today, not a condition."

He said Jews must be "willing to compromise" on the intermarriage issue, and that includes changing Jewish law to recognize paternal, as well as maternal, lineage. He said that patrilineage was the norm among Jews until the 12th century and the time of Maimonides.

"We don't have to worry about keeping the bloodlines pure nowadays. We have DNA," he said.

In fact, Bronfman thinks non-Jews who show an interest in the community should be embraced. "I'm not talking about proselytizing. Jews are not proselytizers. It's simply a question of welcome," he said. "What's really important is an openness to others... Judaism does not mean building a fence around oneself."

He noted that a nephew married a woman of Asian and French background, she converted, and "they have a joyous Jewish life together and three Jewish children."

One of his sons married a Catholic who didn't convert until about 20 years later, yet they have a Jewish household and family, he noted.

Bronfman made a rare public appearance in Montreal to launch his latest book Hope, Not Fear: A Path to Jewish Renaissance, at an event organized by the McGill Alumni Association. Bronfman, formerly CEO of the Seagram Company, graduated with a BA in history from McGill in 1951.

Among his philanthropic works today, he is chair of Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, and he met with local Hillel students while in the city.

The event took the form of an onstage interview between Bronfman and professor Antonia Maioni, director of the McGill Institute for the Study of Canada.

With five children, 23 grandchildren and two great-grandchildren, Bronfman said he can't help but be optimistic about the Jewish future.

He urged Jews to look forward and not backward, and cautioned against using the Holocaust as the reason for being Jewish.

"I want to convince young people to be Jewish for positive reasons, not negative ones," he said.

The use of the word "renaissance" in the title of the book is not to suggest he wants to see the restoration of an earlier age in Jewish history, he said, but rather to usher in a time when Jews are knowledgeable about and proud of the "incredible wisdom of their forefathers."

"The problem is not that Jews are falling in love with non-Jews, it's that Jews are not falling in love with Judaism," Bronfman said.

His passion for Judaism, which was stirred relatively late in life, takes the form of learning and discussing the Jewish intellectual heritage, as well as its ethics and morality. He does not, he said, believe in "the God of the Old Testament," nor does he care for prayer or songs of praise.

But he reads all the Jewish texts he can, from the Bible to Spinoza, and every Thursday afternoon at his office, time is set aside for a group Talmud study session. He finds it "fun."

He has no quarrel with those who prefer a more spiritual Judaism, but he has no patience for denominational Judaism and believes these divisions are turning off young people.

He also has little regard for haredim. "They don't work, the women become baby factories, they only study Talmud, I don't know how they make a living." He suggested they have to "adapt" to the modern society.

Israel is a nation and Judaism is an official religion in the United States, but Jews are basically a people, Bronfman argues, and a great one at that, "not just a religion."

He does not see anti-Semitism as a problem today in North America, and while it's "really bad" in Europe, it's mainly directed at Israel. "I'm convinced that the rest of the world is just waiting for us [Jews] to be a little more gracious, forthcoming and welcoming," he said.

If Jews do encounter prejudice, he advises them, "Don't take it personally. It's not aimed at you. Talk about what it means to be a Jew, and stand up for the positive...If you know who you are, you become steadfast, and the anti-Semites have a real problem."

Hope, not Fear, published last year, is co-authored by Beth Zasloff, a woman in her 30s and former Bronfman Youth Fellow, and Bronfman said he enjoyed the intergenerational project.

Goldstone report 'yet another abuse of due process'

Kemp, who has worked with the IDF and researched its operations, said, "I abhor the way the IDF is automatically indicted of war crimes... as a default setting in the event of a conflict."

That does not occur to other western armies, he said. "I'm a professional soldier I understand the demands and complexities of military operations. I recognize the challenges faced by the IDF."

Kemp's testimony came following a request from UN Watch, a Geneva-based human rights organization. Hillel Neuer, UN Watch's executive director, said Goldstone's "scattershot recommendations" will likely be used by Israel's Arab foes as a weapon with which to attack the Jewish state, and it will likely be cited on university campuses.

With the imprimatur of UNHRC behind it, it could also be referenced by courts around the world, which could claim universal jurisdiction to prosecute alleged war crimes – exposing visiting Israeli military personnel to possible trials, he said.

Neuer said UNHRC has often condemned Israel – last week's resolution also criticized alleged Israeli human rights violations in east Jerusalem – but Richard Goldstone's prestige as a judge lends credibility to the assault.

In Ottawa, meanwhile, Liberal MP Irwin Cotler said UNHRC's special session that considered the Goldstone report proved to be "yet another abuse and denial of international due process to a member state."

Cotler, Canada's former minister of justice and attorney general, said an international group of parliamentarians believes the Human Rights Council's special session to condemn Israel is itself an abuse of UN institutions and an example of systematic bias against Israel.

The Inter-Parliamentary Coalition for Combating Anti-Semitism (ICCA), which Cotler co-founded and chairs, believes "the Goldstone mission was an inherently tainted inquiry from its inception."

Hillel Neuer

The mandate creating the mission prejudged the case against Israel and was rejected by leading democratic states, including Canada, he said. One of its members pronounced Israel guilty before undertaking an investigation, and the mission ignored Hamas provocations that led to Israel's military operation.

The ICCA's founding declaration called on parliamentarians to "expose, challenge and isolate political actors who engage in hate against Jews and target the State of Israel as a Jewish collectivity. Accordingly, ICCA must express its astonishment that the Goldstone report made no reference to the Hamas charter, which openly calls for the destruction of Israel and the killing of Jews where they may be, while openly avowing classic anti-Semitic tropes of the international Jewish conspiracy, including the Protocols of the Elders of Zion. This is a shocking omission in a 575-page report which could not find anyplace to condemn this dangerous anti-Jewish incitement," Cotler said.

ICCA called for an end to singling out Israel for discriminatory treatment, as demonstrated by UNHRC's special sessions, which target Israel as the world's leading human rights violator.

Cotler said he was concerned Israel would face legal difficulties as a result of the Goldstone report. While the United States is expected to veto calls at the Security Council to forward complaints against Israeli troops to the ICC, Israel's foes might rely on another legal manoeuvre.

UNHRC could refer the report to the UN General Assembly, which can forward it to the International Court of Justice for consideration. There is precedent for that route it was used with regard to Israel's security fence, Cotler noted.

Furthermore, the ICC special prosecutor is currently considering a request from the Palestinian Authority that would circumvent the court's normal procedures, to prosecute Israeli soldiers for violating the rules of war.

The treaty establishing the ICC limits the court's jurisdiction to violations that took place on the territory of state parties or if the accused are from state parties to the treaty. Israel is not a party to the treaty and the Palestinian Authority is not a state, let alone a party to the treaty, he said.

Cotler, who was a strong proponent of the ICC when it was created, said the PA has asked to be recognized as tantamount to a state party, and it is worrying that ICC prosecutor Luis Moreno-Ocampo did not automatically reject the request as frivolous.

"In my view, it should have been dismissed, as the Palestinian Authority does not have standing," he said.

STUDENTS OF HISTORY

Bernie M. Farber, Chief Executive Officer, Canadian Jewish Congress attended a ceremony hosted by Her Excellency, The Right Honourable Michaelle Jean, Governor General of Canada, at Rideau Hall last week. The ceremony under her auspices and that of the Commissioners of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission focused on listening to and learning from the history and legacy of the abuses that occurred in the Indian residential schools.

OUTDOOR ADVENTURE: Grade 5 classes at Bialik Hebrew Day School spent a chilly day recently at Adventure Valley in the fall splendour of the conservation area around the site. Students took part in outdoor activities related to the environment, including conservation, green awareness and team-building. Pictured is class 5A with teacher Hanna Issac.

A CLOSER LOOK: Early years classes at United Synagogue Day School's Beth Tikvah campus visited Beth Tikvah Synagogue's chapel with Beth Tikvah's Rabbi Jarrod Grover, who removed a Torah from the Aron Kodesh to let the children have a closer look. They were fascinated by the length of the Torah. The rabbi explained the purpose and usage of a yad as he used it to follow the script.

Program preps high schoolers for campus life

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Jewish community groups have collaborated to create a program for Jewish high school students to prepare them for campus life, to equip them with the resources to advocate for Israel and to inform them of their rights as Jews on campus.

Running simultaneously in Toronto and Montreal in January and February, Campus Ahead, a six-session series, was conceived by the Canadian Council of Conservative Synagogues, Hillel of Greater Toronto, Hillel Montreal, National Jewish Campus Life and the Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy's university outreach committee.

The sessions, which will be led by local campus professionals and student leaders as well as academics, are free of charge and are meant to prepare Grade 11 and 12 students for campus life.

"The idea is to… give them a background on what is Israel, what can you expect being a Jew on campus, being a pro-Israel student on campus, and really, just to get them thinking and to get them prepared so that when they get to campus, the wheels are already turning," said Jennifer Diamond, Hillel of Greater Toronto's assistant director of Israel affairs.

"Obviously, they hear things that have been going on on campus. They might be apprehensive, they might have questions, so it's really just an opportunity to reach out to them before they get onto campus."

She added even if students enter university not knowing what to expect, they can turn to student groups such as Hillel if they want to get involved in Jewish campus life.

"But if they come in with that knowledge, then it's going to be a lot more helpful and a better experience for them."

The sessions will allow students to discuss their connection with Israel, learn facts about Israel and how to effectively advocate on Israel's behalf, develop their skills in media training, coalition building, and debate, meet with student activists, and practise using their new skills in case study scenarios.

Campus Ahead organizers have also scheduled a session with Jeff Robins, a former member of the United Nations Human Right Commission, to answer questions and are working on having former Canadian justice minister Irwin Cotler and Israel's ambassador to Canada, Miriam Ziv, address the students.

"I don't think there is anything quite like this… There are a lot of student initiatives for once you're already on campus. There are Jewish identity programs for high schoolers to deal with issues that happen when you're in high school, but there is no real educational program that is really preparing them to look towards the future a year or two before. In that sense, it's really innovative and interesting," Diamond said.

"Although it's primarily focused on Israel, hopefully some of the skills we'll be teaching them will overlap into other areas."

Diamond added that Campus Ahead doesn't require that students have experience in Jewish leadership.

"Even if they aren't currently involved, but are aware of their Jewish identity on campus or want to be aware, we really are trying to target all levels of involvement and participation."

Carleton urged to waive fee for anti-Israel group

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

More than 60 Carleton University faculty members have signed an open letter that urges the school's president to waive a $4,910 fee for an anti-Israel student to obtain documents to support his group's human rights complaint against Carleton.

Through the Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act, Ben Saifer, a member of Students Against Israeli Apartheid at Carleton, requested about 2,500 pages of documents – administration's e-mails, meeting minutes and records – to support SAIA's claim to the Human Rights Tribunal of Ontario that it was discriminated against by Carleton.

The school asked for the fee to cover what it says are the costs of processing his request.

In August, SAIA filed a complaint against Carleton for of its decision last February to remove 100 posters from campus that depicted a helicopter labelled "Israel" firing a missile at a teddy bear-holding toddler labelled "Gaza."

The posters were advertising Israeli Apartheid Week, an annual week-long series of anti-Israel lectures that originated at the University of Toronto in 2005 and has since spread to more than 20 cities worldwide.

A Carleton spokesperson said at the time that the posters were removed from campus because SAIA didn't have the necessary approval for posting, and because it included an image that was "inflammatory and capable of inciting confrontation," and "could incite infringements of the Ontario Human Rights Code."

In the days following the decision to have the posters removed, Carleton's provost and vice-president academic, Feridun Hamdullahpur, sent a letter to the entire university community calling the posters "hurtful and discriminatory," and said that Carleton "will not tolerate actions that infringe or contravene the Ontario Human Rights Code and Carleton's own University Human Rights Policy and Procedures."

Hamdullahpur added that if anyone is found to be in violation of the school's policies, they will be subject to sanctions under these policies, and "students can be withdrawn from their studies indefinitely."

The administration asked SAIA to submit another version of the poster, and the group complied.

But in August, SAIA, represented by human rights lawyer Yavar Hameed, filed a complaint with the Human Rights Tribunal of Ontario on the grounds that the group and its members were "differentially treated and discriminated against by the Carleton University administration because of their association with, and support of, Palestinians," and were threatened with expulsion as a result.

Carleton responded by saying that the claims made by SAIA are "false and completely unfounded" and that it looked forward to the "opportunity to respond point by point to these false claims once and for all."

A hearing is scheduled for November.

Last month, Saifer circulated his open letter, addressed to president Roseann Runte, among Carleton's faculty and staff. It said that "openness and transparency are in Carleton's (and the public's) best interest when there are concerns about the suppression of free speech, the targeting of students according to their political beliefs, and the detrimental impact of lobby groups on core university values."

The letter also said that by providing SAIA with the requested material promptly and free of charge, Carleton can alleviate concerns that it is creating "a financial barrier to SAIA" to have a fair hearing, which would lead to "serious ramifications for the integrity of our institution."

Carleton spokesperson Lin Moody said that "if a particular requester is unhappy with the fee we have requested to process the request, they have avenues open to them to address their concern.

"It is routine to discuss with any requester the scope of their request so as to assist them in limiting the fee charged, if that is a concern for them."

Canadian among fallen soldiers honoured at memorial ceremony

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

SHA'AR HAGAI, Israel — North Americans who have fallen in Israel in the line of duty or during acts of terror were honoured at the annual Remembering the Fallen ceremony last Wednesday.

A large and tearful group of friends and family members of fallen North Americans attended the ceremony at the AACI Memorial Forest near Sha'ar HaGai Junction, between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv.

The memorial was organized by the Association for Americans and Canadians in Israel (AACI).

"This ceremony is our opportunity to acknowledge as a community that these people and their families have made the supreme sacrifice so that we can live in an independent and strong Jewish state," says Donna Grushka, co-chair of the AACI memorial committee.

Four Americans – Ari Gabbin, Carmi Elan, Uriel Peretz Liwerant and Dagan Moshe Wertman – perished this year, as did one Canadian, Israel Defence Forces Staff Sgt. Noam Adin Rechter Levy. Their names were inscribed on memorial plaques.

Levy, 20, a Montreal-born soldier, was killed on a military mission in Bir Zeit, a village north of Ramallah in the West Bank, on May 7.

Although the final IDF chief of staff's report has yet to be issued, an initial investigation revealed that Levy, a medic with the Duchifat Battalion in the Kfir Brigade, was killed during a regular daily operation, in a scuffle with Arab student rioters. The rifle of one of the soldiers in his company discharged and sent a bullet into Levy's temple, killing him almost instantly.

Noam's parents, Rabbi David and Sharon Levy, were at their home in Mitzpeh Natofa in the Lower Galilee when the pair of reservists came at 6:20 a.m. to notify them of what had happened.

"We were the middle of building a house, so at first I thought it was the construction workers," said Sharon Levy, who is originally from Montreal. "But when I looked at the clock and saw the hour, I realized what it was. No one had to say anything."

Noam, the fourth of five siblings – Ma'ayan, 27; Yaffa, 25; Shira, 23, and Yedidya, 16 – made aliyah along with his family in September 1993, at the age of eight, from Kitchener, Ont., where David Levy had served as the community's rabbi.

Not only had the Levys always wanted to live in Israel, but direct connections to the Holocaust in both Sharon and Rabbi Levy's family histories gave their decision to make aliyah a strong ideological basis, as well.

This family history was particularly moving to Noam, who was close to all of his grandparents, Bernice and the late Zelig Joseph of Montreal and Edith Rechter-Levy and Marcus Levy of Morgantown, W.Va., as well as his uncle, Lawrence Joseph, who attended university in Israel and volunteered during the Yom Kippur War. Noam's middle name, Rechter, was in honour of his grandfather, who was killed in Auschwitz and whose entire extended family was wiped out.

Noam was eager to participate in the March of the Living program before his induction into the IDF. "It was really important to him to go," his father said. "His friends have commented about his behaviour during the trip. It changed him – he was extremely mature, reflective and sober."

The family's choice to live in Mitzpeh Natofa, a small community just west of Tiberias, was an ideological decision, as well. "We wanted to move somewhere that was particularly relevant, either to the Galil or to the Negev," Rabbi Levy said. They settled on Mitzpeh Natofa because it was a warm and welcoming small community.

They also chose Mitzpeh Natofa to make aliyah easier on the children. "We thought having a smaller group of friends to choose from would provide a better cushion, since small groups of friends are more solid," Rabbi Levy said. "And that's exactly what happened. The youth networks here are incredibly strong."

Sharon Levy, the mother of fallen Israel Defence Forces soldier Noam Levy, chats with Canadian defence attaché Col. R.G. (Geordie) Elms.

Noam was part of a tight group of friends who adored him. "He had a real joie de vivre," Sharon Levy said. "He brought the room alive."

He touched the lives of many who were not his close friends, as well. His parents were not surprised to see an older falafel-stand owner and a shoe salesman from Tiberias at Noam's shivah. "He was like the centre of a wheel: where all the spokes meet," his father said. "No matter what circle he was in, he managed to connect to all different spheres and groups. He had a gift for connecting with people."

Noam brought this gift to bear on his work at a nearby kids' club, where he coached basketball. "He was caring and possessed excellent 'physical intelligence,'" his mother said.

Basketball was his sport of choice, and he attended basketball camps in Morgantown, W.Va., where his father is from originally, and at the Wingate Institute in Netanya.

Noam, a graduate of the Yeshiva High School in Tiberias, took school seriously. "I think he would have ended up in medicine," Rabbi Levy said. In Noam's last year in the army, after being promoted to the position of battalion medic, his parents had witnessed the emergence of a new-found passion in their son.

"He loved what he was doing. It was important to him, and he really connected with the type of responsibility the position entailed," his mother said. "I think he found his calling."

He brought great humanist values to his work as a medic. Just a few weeks before he was killed, he tried, unsuccessfully, to resuscitate a Palestinian terrorist who had been seriously injured in an IDF operation. "The guy died in the end," Rabbi Levy said. "But Noam took his responsibilities very seriously and had a doctor's disposition."

Noam Levy

Noam's greatest driving force, however, was Zionism. "He saw great significance in being here and defending Israel for the Jewish people," his mother said. "He was very clear in his mind about our need to be here."

In spite of Noam's death, his parents, too, have not wavered in this belief. "On the day of Noam's death someone said, 'I told my son he should leave Israel!' Why? Tragedies don't happen in Canada, in Spain, in France, in the U.S.?," Sharon Levy said. "We don't agree with this line of thinking. Besides, what, the Jewish people haven't dealt with tragedy over the years?"

The Levys' hope now is to perpetuate their son's life by dedicating their efforts to a cause that was particularly important to him: organ donation. Noam had signed an organ donor card. "It gave him a lot of satisfaction to know that he could help somebody, even in death," said Sharon Levy, adding that Noam's corneas have been donated to two blind people.

"I think each of us is here for a reason, and the fact that the person himself isn't here anymore doesn't diminish his reason for having been here – if anything, it heightens it," she said. "There is a lot of misunderstanding in Israel about the technical and halachic aspects of organ donation, and we will work to raise awareness and advocate on behalf of this cause."

The ceremony for fallen North Americans included an address by Rabbi Levi Lauer, the founding executive director of ATZUM (Avodot Tzdaka U'Mishpat) Justice Works, a foundation established in 2001 to address urgent human need and social ills in Israel.

In addition to friends and family members, the ceremony was attended by Col. R.G. (Geordie) Elms, defence attaché from the Canadian Embassy; Alex Daniels, director of the American Center in Jerusalem and first secretary at the U.S. Embassy, and Lt.-Col. Beni Brosh, from the Home Front Command, as well as representatives from the Keren Kayemeth LeIsrael-Jewish National Fund, the Jewish Agency for Israel, and the Nativ and Young Judea youth movements.

The mystery of the fallen Canadian

The plaques at the AACI Memorial Forest near the Sha'ar HaGai Junction are inscribed with the names of more than 300 Canadians and Americans who have been killed in Israel, dating back to the 1920s, before the establishment of the Jewish state.

"There is a whole history of Canadians who have come here, or lived here, and died here," said Donna Grushka, co-chair of the AACI Memorial Committee.

Among them, she names Polish-born Hashomer Hatzair activist Eliezer (Lulik) Krongold, who made aliyah from Toronto at age 21 (in 1935) and spent a year at Kibbutz America Banir in Hadera before moving on with his garin (group) to Juara in the spring of 1937. On April 7, 1938, when he was returning home from a day's work plowing near Yokne'am, he was ambushed and killed along with his friend, Ephriam (Philip) Tiktin.

Then there is George (Buzzy) Buerling, who was born in Montreal in 1921 and served in the Royal Canadian Air Force as a fighter pilot during World War II. The decorated military hero then came to Israel in 1948 as a volunteer to help the fledgling Israeli Air Force. On May 20, 1948, he died in a plane crash near Rome, where he had been sent on a special secret mission by the Hagana.

Finally, Grushka told the story of Yehayahu (Sidney) Rubinoff, born in Toronto in 1926, who came to Israel to join the Palmach in January 1948, after his service in Europe with the Canadian army in World War II exposed him to survivors of the Holocaust.

"He was [allegedly] shocked by his encounter with the survivors, which awakened in him his Jewish identity," Grushka said.

Rubinoff fought in the battles of Malchai, Ganei Yehoshua, and in Operation Dani to liberate Lod and Ramle. He was fatally wounded in the battle of Latrun and died on the way to hospital on July 17, 1948, at the age of 22.

The AACI adds names of people who have died in the past to Memorial Forest plaques if information about them surfaces and there is significant evidence to support their stories.

The organization is currently trying to get to the bottom of one case, a Canadian named David Bar, who was reportedly killed in the Golan Heights in 1974. "That's all the information we have. We were never able to get very far with this story," said Grushka, who has searched in all relevant archives in Israel, to no avail.

So far, only one source, from Ottawa, has come forward. More details are needed, both to corroborate the story and to learn more about what happened. "I'm afraid until now it has remained a mystery," she said.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Baycrest presents new kind of fundraiser

Compiled by CJN Staff

Baycrest has turned the traditional gala fundraiser upside down with an event that harnesses the power of social media and the popularity of reality TV.

Instead of bringing in big name entertainment for the evening, as is traditional with most galas, the academic health sciences centre has asked six high-profile community leaders to compete with each other in a ballroom dance competition on Oct. 29 at the Dancing With Our Stars Baycrest Gala.

The good-humoured contestants include Toronto Argonauts co-owner David Cynamon; community philanthropist Wendy Switzer Myles, wife of menswear retailer Lou Myles; Deloitte vice-chair Garry Foster; vice-president and senior partner at RSM Richter Robert Harlang; community leader and artist Tootsie Halbert; and real estate icon Sam Reisman, chair and CEO of The Rose Corporation.

They are all dance neophytes far out of their comfort zone, a fact that is creating the kind of hilarity, buzz and sympathy for their plight that Baycrest was hoping for.

The dancers have all posted personal video appeals on YouTube that express, with self-deprecation, bravado and dry humour, why they felt compelled to take the leap to support this cause. They also send regular e-blasts with YouTube links to their practice sessions to increase awareness and enlist donor support from friends, business associates and the public. The dancers have collectively raised close to $1 million in pledges so far and expect to surpass that target.

"These six dancers have galvanized the fundraising community with their spunk and determination," said Mark Gryfe, president of the Baycrest Foundation. "They've created an excitement that we're leveraging with social media to connect with people in a whole new way."

The public can support the dancers' fundraising efforts and watch their practice videos by visiting their personal webpages at www.baycrest.org/dancingwithourstars.

Guests attending the Gala will be able to text message their votes after the performances. Audience votes will be compiled with the scores from a celebrity panel of judges including comedians Colin Mochrie and his wife, Deb McGrath. Television and radio personality Ralph Benmergui will host the evening.

The Dancing With Our Stars Baycrest Gala on Oct. 29 is at 6 p.m. at the Sheraton Centre, 123 Queen St. W., organized by the Women's Auxiliary of Baycrest.

'Anyone can be a competent baker,' Marcy Goldman says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Marcy Goldman's latest book, A Treasury of Jewish Holiday Baking (Whitecap), is redolent of fresh dough, flour, sugar and cinnamon.

More to the point, it's bursting with simple-to-follow recipes for cakes, strudels, cookies, macaroons, doughnuts, tarts, cobblers, hamantashen, buns, bagels, kugels, breads and croissants.

You would die for her mouth-watering almond pastry croissants, Miami Beach coffee cake, caramel cheesecake, Middle Eastern date cookies, layered apple cinnamon cake, raisin challah, cherry squares, roly-poly or banana cake.

Though the Montreal-based baking maven conjures up sugary magic effortlessly, inspiring a sense of wonderment and admiration, Goldman, surprisingly enough, usually declines desserts, considering them "indulgences."

But when her sweet tooth manifests itself, she likes to bite into a scone or a confection dipped in caramel.

"Hamantashen and rugalahs are right up there, too," she said in an interview to publicize her beautifully produced book.

Goldman, the editor and host of BetterBaking.com, an online baking magazine, certainly knows her way around a kitchen. Even before she became a teenager, she was cooking and baking and devouring cookbooks.

Marcy Goldman

Necessity pulled her into the kitchen.

Goldman's mother, Ruth, an English-language teacher, was not domesticated, forcing her to take over the family kitchen.

"If you wanted meals, you had to do it yourself," said Goldman, whose blind, Russian-born grandmother, Annie, moved into the Goldman residence when she was seven years old. "It fell mostly to me to help her with meals, and I wanted to please her."

By 11, Goldman could bake souffles and by 15, she could whip up brioches.

When she was 12, she officially announced her interest in the written word by publishing The Goldman Times, which contained news of her street and lasted for four issues.

The publication was typed by her mother and photocopied by her father, Nathan, the owner of a men's clothing store who could make a tasty breakfast of baked toast, broiled kippers and poached eggs.

Realizing that she was not destined to be an advertising copywriter after studying English literature and marketing at McGill University, Goldman enrolled at a culinary school in Quebec.

Having completed the three-year course as a newly minted pastry chef and baker, she sold carrot cakes to restaurants and cafés in Montreal.

"I was pro-active about self-employment. It's in my blood or in my destiny."

Having given birth to the first of her three sons, she reached a crossroads. She had to decide whether to expand her business and place her son in daycare, or stay at home and cultivate a career as a freelance food writer.

She chose the latter.

Since then, Goldman has written for, among others, the Montreal Gazette, Bon Appetit, New York Times, Los Angeles Times and the Washington Post.

Apart from A Treasury of Jewish Holiday Baking, which was originally released in 1998, she has published The Best of BetterBaking.com and A Passion for Baking.

Currently, she is working on her newest book, The Baker's Four Seasons.

As well, she has been a frequent guest on Sirius' Martha Stewart Living Radio.

Goldman launched BetterBaking.com in 1997, and it has blossomed into one of the biggest independent baking sites on the Internet, featuring original recipes, baking tips, ingredient advice, lifestyle articles and book reviews.

She believes that anyone can be a competent baker. What's required is dedication, the proper tools and equipment and the best ingredients.

"Good food or good baking is accessible to all," she said.

Like her father, she enjoys simple meals of great bread, fine cheese, tantalizing soups and totally fresh salads slathered in amazing vinaigrettes.

She is also partial to fine olive oil, balsamic vinegar, stone ground mustard, garlic, French pepper steak and what she describes as "a Russian grandmother-styled sweet and sour cabbage soup."

Since her sons Jonathan, Gideon and Benjamin live at home, she still cooks for them. She is pleased to say that they respect and appreciate food.

As she put it, "They have a strong sense of taste and food esthetics."

Hardly surprising.

Chef helps kosher foodies eat well

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Brian Mailman, a San Francisco chef and owner of the Jewish Food Mailing List, an online community that shares thousands of kosher recipes, said he learned how to cook "out of self defence."

"My grandmother was a fantastic cook… but unfortunately, it skipped a generation," said Mailman who specializes in Jewish, Mexican, Italian, French and Hungarian cooking.

He said his mother was a bad cook, so he and his brother, who spent a lot of their childhood with their grandmother, had to learn the ropes by helping their grandmother in the kitchen.

Food list features recipes from kaleidoscope of cultures

While Mailman never formally studied culinary arts, he did apprentice with Paul Dufour, a Beverly Hills chef and the inventor of the vertical poultry roaster, from 1980 to 1985, under whom he learned how to be a chef "the old fashion way."

As Dufour's sous chef and saucier, Mailman was taught classic French cuisines such as bistrot, Provençale and haute cuisine styles.

"I spent 12 to 13 hours a day, six or seven days a week for five years [with Dufour]. It wasn't formal training, but it was as if I had a master class," Mailman said.

"What he gave me was an important gift and that was to think about and to analyze what I was doing. With French training, you can take an ingredient you've never seen before and once it's been described to you, you know what to do with it."

For the past 10 years, Mailman has been the owner of the Jewish Food Mailing List, which was founded in 1996 and now boasts more than 2,100 members from 45 countries, including the United States, Canada, Israel, South Africa, Australia, Iceland and Japan.

"The former owner gave it up [in 1999], and I was in a place in my life when I said, 'Well, I can make a go at it... I thought it was a great resource on many levels, so I took it over."

The mailing list provides members with a forum to explore information on holiday menus, food preparation techniques, cookbook resources, restaurant reviews and kashrut guidelines.

Recipes for everyone on Jewish Food List.
[The Hadassah Jewish Holiday Cookbook]

"The members talk to each other, just like a very slow moving chat room," he said.

Mailman said kosher foodies of all levels of observance and culinary skills are welcome to join, but even non-members can browse more than 5,000 recipes.

Mailman said the list is moderated by a team of volunteers, as he wouldn't dream of managing it on his own.

"The moderators are mostly independent from me, and have varying levels of kashrut in their homes. This ensures a lively exchange among the members and not just presenting one viewpoint," he said.

"We have members that range from the ultra-[Orthodox] to the totally secular. Some years ago, we developed the mantra CYLHA – consult your local halachic authority – in order to lessen friction about the 'right' way to do things. That is, 'my way might not be your way, but it's valid for my community.'"

"If you mean cooking according to kashrut, then yes, I certainly do that. If you mean the old Ashkenazi, central European, what we generally think of as Jewish food, then yes," he explained.

"But because in the Diaspora, before massive transportation lines, and rail and ship... we picked up local cooking using local ingredients, so... the Bombay Jews, their cooking is much different."

He said that on one hand, kosher cooking can be limiting, but it doesn't have to be.

"I'm a West Coast Jew, so for me, Jewish food can be burritos. I had this kaleidoscope of cultures coming at me, so I was exposed to it, so I don't feel kosher cooking is limiting," Mailman said.

"I do feel that substitutions don't always work... although I can clarify margarine and make an extremely credible beamaise out of it. But I would rather save a lot of the dairy desserts for dairy meals. I'm not going to try to substitute."

He said while there are certain flavours you can't have in kosher cooking, "if you're not used to eating bacon, you don't miss it. Using a piece of smoked meat is going to work."

In addition to managing the Jewish Food Mailing List, Mailman also writes for the Orthodox Union's electronic newsletter called "Slow Food in the Fast Lane," which can be found at www.ou.org/index.php/shabbat_shalom/column_list/C1449.

"I try to teach basic techniques in a non-threatening way," Mailman said.

Foodie learned skills from her Baba

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Adell Shneer followed a circuitous career path from the graphic design field to Canadian Living magazine's test kitchen, where she works full time as a food specialist.

Along the way, she studied baking at George Brown College 16 years ago when she was pregnant with her third child, took a food styling course at the Culinary Institute of America in Hyde Park, N.Y., and worked in food-related jobs as often as she could while raising her three children.

Serendipitously, her sister, journalist Bonny Reichert, was working for Today's Parent magazine when they needed a recipe tester, and Shneer began her food career there. She started freelancing for Canadian Living about a decade ago.

A former resident baker and cooking teacher for Dish Cooking Studio – and a guest chef and food stylist for the Food Network's Party Dish in 2003 and 2005 – Shneer joined Canadian Living full time four years ago.

At the magazine, she develops recipes from scratch, tests them, and is responsible for many baking-focused stories. She was also involved in developing and testing recipes for the Complete Canadian Living Baking Book published last year.

Her grandmother was "an amazing cook," recalled Shneer in an interview, leaning back comfortably in a kitchen chair at her home, a sampling of baked goods, cheeses and Coronation grapes arrayed on the table beside her.

"Mrs. T. – that was how she was affectionately known – would make everything from scratch. Knishes, and strudel with the dough that stretched out so you could see the tablecloth through it. Varenikes. She could make anything."

Shneer – a native of Edmonton who graduated from Edmonton Talmud Torah Hebrew Day School – also said that her father, Saul Reichert, owned two restaurants in Edmonton – Teddy's, a deli; and Carousel, a steak house. He was in the restaurant business for more than 50 years.

"When I was small, I stood on a box and took cash in Teddy's on Sundays."

Even after she moved to Toronto in 1979 to study fine arts at York University, where she would meet her husband, Michael, Shneer continued to work "front of house" on her summers off.

As a student, she put together a book of her grandmother's recipes for herself, her three sisters and their cousins, working with her to determine what measurements like "half an eggshell of oil" really meant.

Taradash, who died when Shneer was 21, worked for her son-in-law in his restaurant business, and also cooked for her family. Her culinary repertoire ranged from pickled white fish to Turkish delight strudel.

Redolent with plums, raisins, apples and generous quantities of cinnamon and sugar, the dessert also uses a "crazy big dough" and is baked in a roaster.

Shneer has created a number of Jewish recipes, like weeknight Passover dinners, for Canadian Living, which she enjoys.

Other ideas – like a June article on "Tiny Treats" that included a recipe for French almond macaroons – derive from travel.

In France, Shneer recalls, she saw macaroons everywhere, and they were "beautiful."

"We love to travel. I think we never really got it out of our system," said Shneer, who spent a year seeing the world with her husband before their children were born.

A self-described foodie and Twitter regular who thinks that "food inspiration is everywhere," Shneer, a trim 48, attributes her lack of weight issues to "thoughtful" eating, "lots of" family dinners, and consistent workouts that include running and spinning.

Her recipes in Canadian Living are geared for home cooks, using readily available ingredients and easy preparation techniques.

Shneer, whose children have learned their cooking skills at her side, once wrote an article called "Cooking with Baba" about teaching children to cook.

"I really believe in getting your kids into the kitchen, and making it part of your life," she said. "I think I was steeped in it."

Adamah brings a Jewish approach to organic farming

By DOROTHY LIPOVENKO
Special to The CJN

Talia Allen recalls never even playing in the dirt as a kid. Fast forward to the summer of 2009, and that was about to change for her, big time. These past few months she's been shovelling goose manure, building chicken coops, wacking weeds, planting and hoeing a bounty of fresh produce.

For this 180-degree turn in the dirt, the 21-year-old Toronto native journeyed 600 kilometres to rural Connecticut to take part in Adamah, an agricultural program that brings a uniquely Jewish approach to organic farming.

The two are a natural fit.

"We are people of the land," Allen says in a phone interview, noting that many Jewish festivals – Succot being the most visible – are "connected to food and agriculture."

Says Megan Jensen, Adamah's assistant greenhouse manager: "We're bringing people back to the land and reconnecting [them] to Judaism."

The 13 other young adults who joined Allen on the three-month Jewish environmental fellowship learned not just how to farm organically, but how to do so with Jewish values that advance the practice of tikkun olam.

And it's not just the land that benefits. Take, for instance, the goats that graze on the sweet grass of Adamah's six-acre property in the Berkshire Hills. To milk or not to milk them on Shabbat? To alleviate stress to the animals, it was decided to milk them but to discard the liquid so as not to reap any benefit from the labour.

So too does Judaism's moral compass guide ecological practice at Adamah (Hebrew for earth). Surplus produce (think 1,500 strawberry plants and 500 blueberry bushes, to name but a few) harvested in its fields and orchards are donated to a food bank and farmer's market, the latter to raise funds for the local fire department; about 10 per cent of Adamah's fields are left to lie fallow at any given time; practices such as crop rotation, returning nutrients to the soil and composting figure largely in this Jewish eco-culture, underscoring the values of transformation and not wasting what can be reused.

As its website notes in true Adamah spirit: "Where else can you say a blessing while using recycled vegetable oil to fuel a truck that is filled with organic produce and naturally fermented pickles?"

Where indeed.

The Summer 2009 group of Adamahniks.

A sample of Adamah pickled products.

Since its start in 2003, the Adamah program – offered through the Isabella Freedman Retreat Center in Falls Village, Conn. – has hosted several Canadians, including most recently, Allen, and previously, her older sister.

Having worked on an organic farm in British Columbia and pursuing a degree in environmental studies from York University, Sabrina Malach easily slipped into Adamah's groove during her stint in 2005.

"It was a huge tikkun for me. I learned that Judaism is inherently agriculturally rooted and environmentally responsible," says the 28-year-old from Toronto, whose experience at Adamah led her to Israel and studies in ecology and Torah.

Malach is an alumna of Adamah's fall session, when a new crop of "Adamahniks" rotates through three months of harvesting, preparing the gardens for winter and cooking in the "picklearium," its commercial kitchen that processes pickles, jam and tomato sauce for sale.

Like the summer group, the fall newcomers are exposed to Jewish spiritual and cultural programming, as well as training in Jewish leadership skills, and take their rest on Shabbat. They, too, start the day with Avodat Lev (service of the heart), the chanted morning prayers that include several minutes of silent meditation. And they get to celebrate Succot in the splendour of a New England autumn.

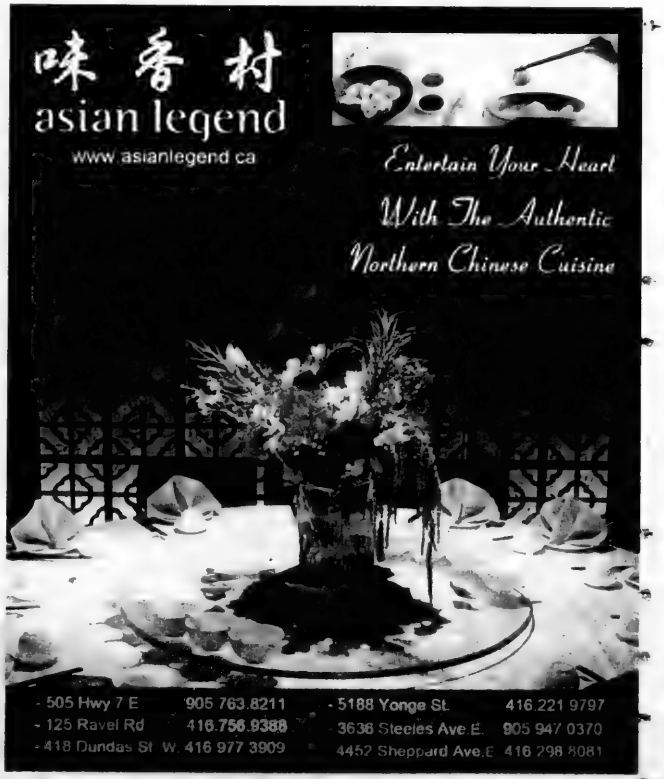
Some alumni, like Risa Alyson Strauss, have transplanted their Adamah experience and broadened its reach in programs such as the Kavanah Organic Community Teaching Garden.

Opened earlier this year through the Jewish Nature Centre of Canada at the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan, Ont., the Kavanah Garden is organic farming the Jewish way.

Whether using discarded broom handles for infrastructure, applying Jewish agricultural law to planting or donating its bountiful harvest to those in need, the Kavanah Garden is about teaching.

To that end, it has hosted an eclectic mix including school children and seniors, says Strauss, Kavanah's program director who used her apartment's sunroom last winter to jump-start seeds in pots for transplanting. They would become the basis for Kavanah's 40- by 80-foot garden, which includes organic fruits, vegetables and Havdalah spices.

Aside from the garden, there are adult classes on Jewish-holiday harvest cooking and agricultural roots of the Jewish calendar. The two-hour workshop for elementary-aged children includes organic gardening practices.



And now for something completely different: HEEBONICS

By VICKY TOBIANAH
Special to The CJN

The first time Monday Rose played together as a band, they knew their combined individual talents created a musical sensation, and since that first performance, they have been impressing their many fans.

At first glance, Monday Rose may seem like your typical rock 'n' roll band. The guitarist, Randy Starr, describes it otherwise.

"There are a lot of rock bands out there, so we decided to be a 'roll' band," Starr said.

"Maybe we should just be the 'n' in the rock 'n' roll," lead singer and lyricist Ari Lyon added.

Since coming together in 2008, the band has played countless shows and is currently releasing its first EP, a record that their fans are eagerly looking forward to.

Lyon said that he's always loved making music.

"There are videos of me from when I was two, talking about how I was going to be a rock star when I grew up," he said.

"I was born with a guitar sticking out of my stomach. So I had to play," Starr added.

Growing up, Lyon recalled attending many Jewish song sessions with his mother, who was a youth group adviser.

"For the first many years of my life, I only knew [Jewish singer] Debbie Friedman existed. I didn't realize there were other bands out there," he said.

His love affair with music encouraged him to fulfil his dreams, and after recording his first demo, he began playing shows across Toronto.

He met Starr through a mutual friend, and they quickly realized they had something special.

"We don't like to sound conceited, but after we perform, we just look at each other and smile. We all pat ourselves on the back," Lyon said.

"There is a lot of laughter during our shows. We're four individually good entertainers, so we all come together to make a great show. Our fans can tell we love making music, and we're having a great time doing it."

Their music, a mix between Coldplay and Kings of Leon, appeals to a wide audience. Whether you're a metal fan, interested in rock 'n' roll or have more modern music taste, there is bound to be an element in their sound that appeals to you.

One of their favourite songs, September Girl, begins with simple guitar chords and tells a story about a young couple in love and an elderly couple who attempt to remember their youthful past.

With a sound that crosses between Coldplay and Kings of Leon, part of what hooks their fans is their stage presence and a commitment to putting on an entertaining show.

"Remember our good old days/ before all we did was go see operas and plays," the lyrics says. "We were so in love and/ it constantly showed/ apart for one day and we thought we'd explode/ with that/ the man smiled and said, 'yeah, I remember/ my September girl.'"

Monday Rose members have a unique ability to relate to their fans, which differentiates them from other local bands.

The band's name, Monday Rose, stems from the word Montrose, which was the name of the boat Lyon's grandfather took to escape Nazi-occupied Poland.

They use this name as a symbol of strength and redemption.

"It meant a lot to us, since a lot of families were affected by the Holocaust. We felt it was something a lot of people could relate to and take meaning from," he said.

"It is still relevant today, since these type of things are still happening all over the world. We wanted to symbolize this idea of survival and renewal."

By creating music, they want to unite different types of people.

"Our biggest strength is that we appeal to all audiences, and whether we are performing for two people or 200 people, we treat the shows the same," he said.

"We all make music together, and there is no one who takes control more than others. Musically, there is no competition. But with everything else there is," Lyon said with a laugh.

Monday Rose singer Ari Lyon said he dreamed of becoming a rock star since he was a toddler.

Together, they work through the many challenges the music industry can bring.

Now, when other challenges arise, the band members learn to make the best of each situation.

"It wouldn't be fun if there were no struggles and if everything was easy for us, because you learn from each challenge and come back stronger," Lyon said.

When it comes to their music, the vocals and the lyrics, the members of Monday Rose are simply interested in creating a lasting impression with their audience and eliciting some kind of a reaction.

More than that, they believe in the true value of music.

"Music and art in general is the greatest thing to ever happen to us as people. It's the only thing we can all agree on," Lyon said.

"Artists are like the modern version of prophets. When any major event happens in the world, good or bad, the poets and painters are the ones left standing, showing their work and saying, 'I told you so.'"

As for advice to those who wish to form their own bands, the boys agree with Lyon: "Just do it! Everyone should start a rock band," he said.

Without missing a beat, Starr challenges his bandmate.

"Don't you mean a 'roll' band?"

Goldstone make-over: Human Rights Council ignores Hamas

By URIEL HEILMAN
JTA

NEW YORK — Who says there are no do-overs in international politics?

When, late last month, the Palestinian Authority asked the UN Human Rights Council in Geneva to delay a vote on a resolution endorsing the Goldstone report on the Gaza war, the move sparked a firestorm of anger among Palestinians. Hamas leaders and protesters in the West Bank declared that Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas had betrayed the Palestinian people by caving in to U.S. and Israeli pressure, scuttling a resolution on a report faulting Israel with war crimes against Palestinians in Gaza.

So Abbas quickly reversed course, first pressing the UN Security Council to take up the matter – which it did, this week, albeit informally – and then asking the Human Rights Council to reconvene for a special session on the Goldstone report. The council, whose next scheduled session is next March, agreed.

The result was a quick endorsement Friday by the 47-member council of the report, produced by a fact-finding mission on the Gaza war led by retired South African jurist Richard Goldstone.

Israel had refused to co-operate with the fact-finding mission from the get-go, asserting that its mandate to investigate only Israeli "grave violations of human rights" and not Hamas' actions was inherently biased.

While the report's mandate later expanded to include consideration of Hamas misconduct during the fighting, the resolution the council endorsed Friday restored that bias, prompting a rebuke from Goldstone himself.

"There is not a single phrase condemning Hamas, as we have done in the report," Goldstone was quoted as saying by AFP, the French press agency.

The Human Rights Council voted 25 to 6 to endorse Goldstone's report and recommend that other UN bodies heed its recommendations. While the council's vote is not legally binding, it asks that the UN General Assembly consider the Goldstone report, and the report itself recommends that the UN Security Council refer war crimes prosecutions to the International Criminal Court if Israel does not take action within six months to investigate the alleged crimes cited in the report.

In Friday's vote, the six countries voting against the resolution were the United States, Hungary, Italy, the Netherlands, Slovakia and Ukraine. Eleven countries abstained and five countries didn't vote at all – a highly unusual occurrence at the council – including Britain and France. Among the yes votes were Russia, China, Argentina and Egypt.

The resolution also expressed "deep concern" at Israeli restrictions on Arab worshippers at the Temple Mount, which Israeli police imposed during unrest during the recent Sukkot holiday.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu warned that Israel must prepare for a protracted struggle against a damning United Nations report on its winter offensive in Gaza, after the UN's Human Rights Council endorsed the report.

"The delegitimization [of Israel] must be delegitimized," said Netanyahu at meetings last Friday. He said the battle against the report would be legal and diplomatic, adding that Israel should take the appropriate measures against it.

While the UN investigation labelled Hamas rocket attacks on Israeli towns as war crimes, the bulk of the findings focused on Israeli actions during the three-week campaign.

The 575-page document concluded that Israel used disproportionate force, deliberately targeted civilians, used Palestinians as human shields and destroyed civilian infrastructure during the operation to root out Gaza rocket squads.

In his comments Friday, Netanyahu further said that the report was a symptom of a broader phenomenon that has taken place in the West and UN institutions over recent years.

"The UN has returned to the dark days during which it equated Zionism with racism," he added.

Meanwhile, Israel will seek clarifications from Russia, China and India in light of their voting for the motion on Friday. Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon said Israel was disappointed by those countries' behaviour.

"They needed to act with greater consideration, since the report is unprofessional, false and takes the right to self-defence from democratic states, which in the end will also hurt them," said Ayalon at a cultural event in Holon.

Also Friday, Israel's Foreign Ministry rejected the council's decision to endorse the report, calling the decision "unjust."

The Foreign Ministry issued an official response to the UN vote, saying that "Israel will continue to exercise its right to self-defence and to preserve the security of its citizens."

"Israel believes," the statement continued, "that the decision harms efforts to protect human rights in accordance with international law and hinders efforts to promote the peace process as well as encouraging terror organizations around the world."

U.S. State Department spokesperson Ian Kelly on Friday defended the U.S. vote against adopting the resolution, saying it had an "unbalanced focus" and that the U.S. is concerned "it will exacerbate polarization and divisiveness."

Kelly continued by saying that the U.S. vote against endorsing the report "in no way diminishes the deep concern that we have about the tragic events of last January and the suffering caused by the violence in Gaza and southern Israel."

The parties need adequate time to study the report and establish accountability measures, said Kelly, adding that U.S. envoy George Mitchell will be meeting with Israeli and Palestinian officials this week and next.

Meanwhile, Friday, Hamas welcomed the UN vote, saying that the organization hoped it would lead to "the beginning of the prosecution of the leaders of the occupation."

Report accuses UN agency of siding with Hamas

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The United Nations' agency that provides services to Palestinian refugees is operating as a mouthpiece for Hamas and repeating propaganda that attacks Israel, a report by an Israeli watchdog organization concluded recently.

Far from being a neutral humanitarian agency that steers clear of controversial political positions, the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) often repeats Hamas talking points. Its spokespeople have accused Israel of a disproportionate response to Hamas rocket attacks and exaggerated the damage done by Israeli attacks, stated the report, UNRWA: Its Role in Gaza.

David Bedein, who heads the Center for Near East Policy Research, which published the report, said "UNRWA played a role in lying and exaggerating about the situation in Gaza." UNRWA employs numerous Palestinians who are represented by a union dominated by Hamas, he said. "UNRWA employees are beholden to and are constitutionally controlled by Hamas. They're running an agency that's dominated by organized crime."

The report, written by Arlene Kushner, senior analyst for the centre, claims UNRWA spokespeople who are not Palestinian have become advocates for the Palestinian side in the Israeli-Arab conflict. They have accused Israel of unjustifiable retaliation for Hamas attacks and explained away the Palestinian rocket launches into Israel as a case of resisting occupation – "saying precisely what Hamas says for PR purposes."

The report also examined one of the most incendiary claims that came out of last winter's Cast Lead operation in Gaza – that the Israel Defence Force hit an UNRWA school in Jabaliya that was sheltering civilians, killing 40. The report found that Israel's own investigation revealed 10 Hamas gunmen were killed near the school, which was never hit.

Kushner, who has written other reports detailing terrorists' control over UNRWA camps, said UNRWA "has a predisposition for covering for Hamas....It takes my breath away, what they say." Statements by Karen AbuZayd, UNRWA Commissioner-General, clearly indicate "she has a bias in a particular direction."

The report cites several AbuZayd statements, including one it termed the "most egregious" in which the UNRWA official told an audience at DePauw University earlier this year that, "'the saddest thing is that all the private sector – every single factory and workshop – was destroyed.'"

"This is a patently ridiculous attempt to present the damage done by Israel in the course of the war in the worst possible light," Kushner stated in the report.

Bedein said UNRWA, as a UN agency, "has tremendous credibility and that's what Israel is fighting, the misinformation promulgated by Hamas. Hamas propaganda operation is sanctioned and organized through the UNRWA camps."

The agency has adopted the Palestinian "Right of Return" narrative, which argues Palestinians should be allowed to return to pre-1948 homes in Israel. That is not consistent with the treatment of refugees anywhere, said Bedein, saying Palestinians should be integrated into host communities.

"They're fomenting discontent and anger instead of trying to end the conflict," Kushner added.

Israeli ambassador undecided about attending J Street conference

By NATASHA MOZGOVAYA
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

WASHINGTON — The Oct. 25 conference in Washington, D.C., of left-leaning lobby group J Street is just one week away, but Israel's ambassador to the United States, Michael Oren, is still not saying whether he will attend.

President Shimon Peres has written a welcoming letter to conference participants, J Street said, with his apologies for not being able to attend.

Ambassador Oren spoke Sunday at a Reform synagogue, the Washington Hebrew Congregation, and was asked about his conflict with J Street, but would not say whether he would attend the conference. He said that the American Jewish community's strength was always in its diverse opinions. He praised the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations as an appropriate framework for representing American Jews. He did not mention, however, that J Street is not included in that organization.

Daniel Kohl, J Street's political director, was in the audience for Oren's speech. He said it was still possible that Oren would accept the organization's invitation to speak at the conference. Among American officials attending is U.S. National Security Adviser James Jones, who will be a keynote speaker. He represents the Obama administration. Senator John Kerry was also invited to speak, as were several members of Congress, former U.S. ambassador to Israel Martin Indyk and Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the Union of Reform Judaism.

The Israelis whom J Street listed as attending the conference include Knesset members and former parliamentarians from Labor and Kadima – Amir Peretz, Shlomo Ben-Ami and MKs Shlomo Molla and Yuli Tamir.

J Street was set up more than two years ago to offer an antidote to the America Israel Public Affairs Committee. AIPAC enjoys substantial support in both the Democratic and Republican parties and is identified with a more "rightist" line on the peace process. J Street defines itself as being "for Israel and for the peace process."

Senior members of J Street have had close ties to senior figures in the Obama campaign, and since he was elected, they have been consulted by the administration. When President Barack Obama met with the heads of Jewish organizations in the U.S., representatives of J Street were also invited.

Participation in the J Street conference is a sensitive political issue in Washington – and also at the Foreign Ministry and the Prime Minister's Office in Jerusalem. Senior Israeli officials say Oren has not been given any instruction and was told the decision to participate or not was his to make. Oren apparently is inclined not to participate and to send a lower-ranking diplomat in his stead.

Arguments against the ambassador's participation hinge primarily on the belief that J Street is not a pro-Israel lobby, despite its claims.

In Israel, there is concern that AIPAC will interpret participation as an act against it. "You don't turn your back on someone who has acted in your favour for decades," said a senior Israeli official. "Certainly not in favour of an organization that has done nothing for Israel." The official added: "We have no reason to build up or bolster J Street."

Israeli domestic politics are also a likely factor in the decision on whether to participate. The vast majority of the politicians from Israel who have confirmed their participation in the J Street conference are mostly from the left.

Meanwhile, J Street's executive director Jeremy Ben-Ami sent a letter to Ambassador Oren on Friday, inviting him to the conference, reiterating the support of the group for Israel and for an immediate resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict through peaceful means. Ben-Ami said that at the conference "we will come together as pro-Israel activists to discuss the best path forward for Israel and the United States in troubling circumstances, balancing a desire for security and for peace and a commitment to the values we bring to the table as Jews and as Americans."

Michael Oren

He also reminded Oren that in the past "you've spoken publicly of the need for Israeli officials to engage with progressive elements in the American Jewish community that have not traditionally been attracted to pro-Israel lobbying."

Oren told the synagogue audience on Sunday that the Obama administration's demands for a total freeze on settlement construction was impossible politically and practically. He said for Jews not to live in the land of their forefathers was problematic. But he said today there were no significant differences between the Israeli and U.S. positions on freezing construction, and over a few months a compromise was reached on a limited freeze, which will differentiate east Jerusalem from the West Bank and allow normal life in the settlements.

U.S., Israel planned suicide attack: Iran

JTA

TEHRAN — The head of Iran's Revolutionary Guard has accused the United States, Britain and Pakistan, as well as Israel, of planning a suicide attack that killed 42.

The attack Sunday in south Iran killed five senior Revolutionary Guards commanders and 37 others. The attack occurred at a reconciliation meeting between Shiite and Sunni tribal leaders who gathered in southeastern Iran near the Pakistani border. The bomber was reportedly disguised in tribal dress.

"The American and Israeli intelligence agencies are behind this. We must pay them back in order to punish them, and, God willing, we hope to be able to do so," Gen. Mohammad Ali Jafari said Monday.

The Muslim militant group Jundallah, or Soldiers of God, which operates along the Iranian-Pakistani border and is said to be affiliated with Al Qaeda, claimed responsibility for the attack, according to reports.

In related developments, Iran said it will further enrich uranium itself if nuclear talks in Vienna this week with the UN watchdog International Atomic Energy Agency, Russia, France and the United States in Vienna fail.

"If the talks do not bring about Iran's desired result... we will start to further enrich uranium ourselves," Ali Shirzadian, spokesman for Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, told Iran's official IRNA news agency a few hours before the talks were scheduled to start.

The meeting was to discuss details of sending Iran's low-enriched uranium abroad for further processing and return to Tehran. The issue was agreed "in principle" between Iran and world powers in Geneva on Oct. 1. But Iranian authorities have so far shown no public hints of flexibility over Iran's nuclear row with the West.

The UN Security Council has imposed three rounds of sanctions on Iran for refusing to stop its sensitive enrichment work.

Shirzadian said Iran had no intention of suspending its enrichment.

"Buying nuclear fuel from abroad does not mean Iran will stop its uranium-enrichment activities inside the country," Shirzadian said.

The West fears Iran's nuclear program is a front to obtain a bomb. Iran says it needs nuclear technology to generate power.

International negotiators are holding key talks with Iran that could see it handing over most of its enriched uranium for processing abroad.

Italian Jews launch new Jewish newspaper—for non-Jews

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
JTA

ROME — When Italy's first national Jewish newspaper launches this month, Italy will get what few Jewish communities around the world offer: a Jewish newspaper geared toward non-Jews.

Sponsored by the Union of Italian Jewish Communities, or UCEI, the umbrella organization that links Italy's 21 established Jewish communities, the newspaper and an online Jewish information portal launched last year are part of a multi-dimensional media offensive aimed at bolstering the Jewish voice in Italy and creating a constructive dialogue between Jews and non-Jewish Italians.

"Italian Jews are very representative of Italian society in general," said journalist Guido Vitale, who directs the newspaper, Pagine Ebraiche (Jewish Pages), and the website, Moked.it. "I want to construct a piazza, an agora, where they can interact with each other and with Italian society."

The impetus behind them is the UCEI's desire to confront a seeming paradox: Italians are fascinated by things Jewish even though the country's 30,000 Jews comprise a tiny fraction of the population of 60 million.

"There is a huge interest in Jews and Jewish culture here," said Emanuele Ascarelli, who directs "Sorgente di Vita" (Source of Life), a biweekly Jewish television program co-produced by UCEI and state-run RAI television that draws 200,000 to 400,000 viewers. Ascarelli estimates that 90 to 95 per cent of them are not Jewish.

He says the new media initiatives reaching out to the non-Jewish world reflects a new self-confidence among Italian Jews.

"The Jews in Italy have changed a lot in recent years," he said. "There's no longer the sense of being in a symbolic ghetto. There is a greater openness to making ourselves known. The desire of non-Jews to know the Jewish reality thus meets with the desire of Jews to be known. This is a dynamic process."

Numerous Jewish-themed cultural events, including festivals, food tastings, book launches and concerts, take place throughout the year throughout the country. In September, on the annual European Day of Jewish Culture, nearly 60,000 Italians – most of them non-Jews – flocked to Jewish-themed lectures, exhibits and other events held in nearly 50 towns and cities up and down the peninsula.

Scores of articles on Jewish-related topics appear in the mainstream media each week. In one year, Vitale said, the press review on Moked included more than 100,000 articles, most of them in the Italian press. Many, of course, are on Israel and the Middle East. But even elections to the Jewish community organization are apt to make headlines.

At the same time, ignorance about Jewish beliefs, traditions and values – not to mention Israel – is widespread in Italy.

"There is an incredible over-exposure, but the capacity for understanding is generally low," Vitale said. "In the Italian mainstream media, Jews are usually the objects of news, of something happening. In Pagine Ebraiche, Jews will make their own voices heard."

To be published monthly and with an initial press run of 30,000, Pagine Ebraiche will be sold at selected newsstands in major Italian cities. Its contents will include news reports, essays, commentaries, historical articles, cultural pieces and other material, all written to be accessible to the general public.

"Its role will be to speak to the external world, not the internal Jewish world," Vitale said. "We want to open a dialogue with the external world."

With non-Jewish Italians its target audience, Pagine Ebraiche will not replace the Jewish print media in Italy, which include glossy monthlies in Rome and Milan with small press runs that are directed at Jewish readers.

The reasons for the prominence of Jews and Jewish culture in Italy are rooted in the long, complex history of Jews in Italy, as well as the symbolism attached to Jews as survivors who have maintained their identity despite waves of violent discrimination.

Jews have lived in Italy since ancient Roman times; the Rome Jewish community is the oldest continuous Jewish community in the Diaspora.

Over the centuries, popes persecuted Jews in parts of Italy. In the mid-19th century, Jews took an active part in the Italian Risorgimento, or liberation process. They won civil rights and became highly acculturated into Italian society.

But fascist dictator Benito Mussolini, allied with Nazi Germany, imposed harsh anti-Jewish laws, and about one-fifth of Italian Jews perished in the Holocaust. After World War II, Italy's surviving Jews were bolstered by immigrants from many countries, including thousands who came from Libya fleeing anti-Semitic violence in 1967.

More recently, Palestinian terrorists attacked Rome's main synagogue in 1982, and in 1986 Pope John Paul II made a historic visit there. He embraced Rome's chief rabbi in a gesture that symbolized a new era in Catholic-Jewish relations.

"Everything that Jews do has a symbolism," Ascarelli said. "What Jews say counts on issues such as immigration, minority rights, the Shoah, the culture of memory."

UCEI president Renzo Gattega elaborated on this attitude in a report presented last year to the organization's leaders in which he laid out the reasons for broadening the Jewish media to reach beyond the community.

"A minority like ours cannot only have the goal of recounting itself and its history, or only reacting to the initiatives and actions of others, be they positive or negative," he said. "Rather it must act concretely to bear witness of its values, its identity, its vitality."

Shabbat welcomed in Kielce synagogue, again

JTA

KIELCE, Poland – Shabbat came to a Polish synagogue for the first time since the Holocaust.

Services were held Friday night and Saturday at the Kielce synagogue, which was reconstructed after World War II and since 1951 has been used as the district archives. A traditional Shabbat dinner, a guided walk through Jewish Kielce and a Havdalah ceremony were followed by a party.

Interfaith meetings were also part of the commemoration and included prayers in two Christian churches.

Some 25,000 Jews lived in Kielce before World War II; 20,000 were murdered by the Nazis. The town is infamous as the site of the last pogrom in Poland, a massacre of 42 Jews by a mob who attacked the Jewish community house more than a year after the war was over, on July 4, 1946.

The Kielce weekend was the latest in a series of Shabbaton programs in long-disused Polish synagogues organized by Michael Traison, an American lawyer who has an office in Warsaw. Earlier events took place in Pinczow, Piotrkow Trybunalski, Przemysl and Lublin.

Traison said he wanted to remember the destroyed communities, and to demonstrate that the Jewish people survived and thrived and still exist in Poland. He also wanted to bring together Poles and Jews, as well as "provide a Jewish religious experience for people who would like to participate in such an experience and enjoy a good Shabbat."

1,700-old footprint found

Archeologists discovered footprints underneath an ancient mosaic in Israel. The 1,700-year-old foot and sandal prints, including an imprint of a sole that resembles a modern sandal, were uncovered when the Lod Mosaic was removed for conservation. The mosaic, one of the largest ever found in Israel, was exposed in the city of Lod in 1996. The Israel Antiquities Authority is conserving and developing the site. The mosaic was re-excavated and exhibited to the public, and now is being removed from the area for treatment in the IAA conservation laboratories. It is believed the mosaic floor was part of a villa that belonged to a wealthy man in the Roman period. "Based on the concentration of foot and sandal prints, it seems that the group of builders tamped the mortar in place with their feet," said Jacques Neguer, head of the IAA Art Conservation Branch. "The excitement here was great. It is fascinating to discover a 1,700-year-old personal mark of people who are actually like us, who worked right here on the same mosaic. We feel the continuity of generations here."

Israeli aid to Burkina Faso

Israel sent special aid to Burkina Faso. The West African country is suffering from a severe humanitarian crisis, due to recent floods. Hundreds of thousands of people have become refugees in their own country. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs, in co-operation with the JDC Israel, sent a shipment of tents, blankets, medicines and baby food to the stricken country.

Israel bombs Gaza tunnels

Israel bombed two Gaza smuggling tunnels. The attack on Gaza's border with Egypt wounded four Palestinian tunnelers, according to reports citing Gaza emergency services. It was in retaliation for a Palestinian rocket attack from Gaza into southern Israel the previous evening. The Israel Defence Forces said the tunnels were being used for smuggling weapons into Gaza. Some 250 rockets have been fired at southern Israel since the end of last winter's Gaza military offensive.

Zapatero in Israel

Spain's president José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero was in Israel for a one-day visit, part of a larger tour that included Syria. Spain is interested in expanding its role to help restart peace talks between Israelis and Palestinians. Accompanied by Spanish Foreign Minister Miguel Ángel Moratinos, the trip to Israel included meetings with President Shimon Peres, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and opposition leader Tzipi Livni of the Kadima party. Zapatero also went to Ramallah, where PA President Mahmoud Abbas gave him a medal of honour for the Spanish government's support for the "liberty and independence of the Palestinian people."

Children's deportations likely

Israel will likely deport 1,200 children of foreign workers and their families at the end of the school year. No final decision was made during last week's meeting of cabinet. The children were born in Israel, speak Hebrew as their mother tongue and attend local schools. The cabinet also authorized a special task force, called Oz, to continue to arrest illegal workers.

Turkey-Israel ties 'strong'

Turkey's relationship with Israel remains strong, the Turkish deputy prime minister said. Relations "have always been strong and we have total belief that these relations will always be strong," Bulent Arinc told reporters. Arinc, whose portfolio includes state-run TV, also said he won't censor a program that depicts Israeli soldiers deliberately killing Palestinian children during last winter's Gaza War. Israel's Foreign Ministry summoned Turkey's ambassador over the broadcast. Arinc noted that the series was fiction. Israeli-Turkish relations have grown tense since the Gaza war.

Show and sale of ceremonial objects at London shul

By NICOLE LAIDLER
Special to The CJN

More than 60 artists from across Canada will gather in London, Ont., this week for Congregation Or Shalom's "Ceremonial Objects for the Jewish Home II."

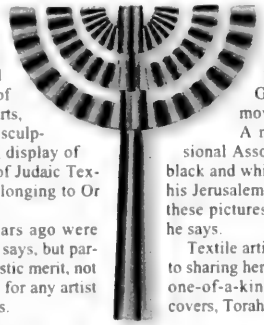
The juried show and sale is a tribute to the late Esther Wolf and Muriel Ginsberg, who organized London's first Judaica exhibition in 1980.

"I remember the first show, and I've been thinking about revisiting it for a long time," says "Ceremonial Objects" chair Alice Negus, who proposed the event in early 2008.

The four-day exhibition has attracted artists and artisans working in a variety of media, including fibre, calligraphy, fine arts, glass, metal, mixed media, printmaking, sculpture, pottery and ceramics. A travelling display of mezzuzot from the Pomegranate Guild of Judaic Textiles, Toronto, and ceremonial items belonging to Or Shalom synagogue are also on display.

Several artists who took part 30 years ago were quick to sign up this time around, Negus says, but participants were selected based on their artistic merit, not on their Jewish roots. "We were looking for any artist willing to try to create Judaica," she says.

Columbian-born glassmaker Daniel Castillo was happy to take up the challenge.



Glass menorah by Daniel Castillo

The master craftsman, who fled his homeland in 2006, is no stranger to London's Jewish community. Castillo won a commission to create a stained-glass Holocaust memorial window for the city's Jewish community centre last year.

"When I met the Jewish community, it was a big blessing for me, so I wanted to be part of this show," he says. "I learned a lot about the Jewish faith through my research [for the Holocaust memorial project]," says Castillo.

As an artist who has always incorporated symbolism into his work, Castillo found the menorah especially meaningful. "For me, it is one of the most beautiful symbols I have seen in my life," he says. He created a glass menorah and Star of David especially for the "Ceremonial Objects" show.

Victor Golverk is another new Canadian whose work is on display at Or Shalom. Born in Uzbekistan in 1966, Golverk made aliyah in 1990 before moving to London eight months ago.

A member of the Israel Artists' Professional Association, Golverk is showing a series of black and white paintings of chassidic life, created in his Jerusalem studio. "It's interesting for me to show these pictures to the Jewish community in London," he says.

Textile artist Marilyn Levy is also looking forward to sharing her work with a new audience. Levy creates one-of-a-kind tallitot, mezzuzot, chupahs, challah covers, Torah mantles and kippot out of natural fabrics such as silk, linen and cotton.

The Hamilton-based artist made her first tallit for personal use in 1990. Today she accepts commissions from people around the world. "You find out what they want," Levy says. "Sometimes you start with a colour, sometimes with a theme."

Many clients use verses from the Torah or siddur as their inspiration.

"I will not [embroider] the tallit blessing on the collar," says Levy. Anybody who wants a custom-made tallis already knows that blessing by heart, she says. "When you wrap that prayer shawl around you, whether you are male or female, it should be meaningful and personalized."

Levy considers her creations "hiddur mitzvah" – something that enhances the mitzvah. "Even an ordinary, everyday mitzvah such as washing the hands becomes more special when one dries one's hands on a special hand-embroidered towel," she says.

Singer scats his way through jazz standards

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

"I don't want to sing a song the same way every night." So Ori Dagan tells me in an interview, and it might as well be his motto.

The Toronto jazz singer may have had classical training at York University, but his true calling was always jazz and scat singing.

Ori Dagan

Dagan, 28, will release his debut CD on Oct. 24 at Chalker's Pub on Marlee Avenue in Toronto. S'Cat Got My Tongue blends his love of jazz standards with his love affair with scat, the improv-heavy song genre in which the singer makes up sounds and syllables on the spot.

It's rare to see anyone under-30 dabbling in a style associated with 1920s fedoras, finger-snaps and Ella Fitzgerald. It's even odder to spot a male jazz singer scatting his way through a walking bass line. But Dagan says jazz always spoke to him. "Improvising makes jazz interesting," he says. "I find it energizing and a fun challenge." He adds that a singer can offer a riff to an audience in many ways, and it's never the same tune twice.

He not only scats in English, but Hebrew as well.

"I'm Israeli, so it makes sense to throw in some Hebrew in there," Dagan says, laughing.

Perfecting scat is no easy task, Dagan admits. He has to be careful about what vowels to emote during his improv singing. He also learned a valuable lesson from his past few years of scatting: "Vowels are emotion, syllables are information." He likens scat to sound poetry, in which the rhythm impacts the music more so than the literal meaning of the words.

Dagan isn't all scat. On his newly pressed CD, he belts out jazz arrangements and show tunes, such as I Wish I Were in Love Again from Babes in Arms. "I try to make the songs my own," Dagan says, "even if the song is well-known to jazz fans."

Dagan came to jazz during a stint at University of Toronto studying English. He then enrolled in York's music program, focusing on jazz vocals and classical voice. "After a year of classical study, every teacher told me to pursue opera," he recalls. So much for that plan.

After York, Dagan went on to Humber College to take several songwriting and voice classes. He was inspired by other Toronto jazz singers, such as Laila Biali and Sophia Perlman. "Humber has a great program, I would love to teach there someday."

Now focused on the CD release and getting the album in as many hands as possible, Dagan is hungry to tour. So far, he's been playing at almost every jazz club in the city. "I have my sights set on Japan," he says. "Tokyo has hundreds of jazz clubs – I'm interested in experiencing that kind of passion for jazz."

For now, Torontonians will get their fill of this scat master. Dagan knows he's immersed in a bygone era, but if anyone can resurrect jazz singing and make it hip for the under-30 set, it'd be a young Israeli-Canadian with a penchant for Billie Holiday.

Unique Negev village focus of documentary

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

The Planet in Focus International Environmental Film & Video Festival is teaming up with the International Diaspora Film Festival and Voices Forward to present Land & Conflict, a multimedia program examining people and land in contested terrain

One of the more interesting films is the Canadian premiere of Voices from El-Sayed. This 2008 documentary by Israeli filmmaker Oded Adomi Leshem focuses on the Bedouin village of El-Sayed in the Negev, which has the largest community of deaf people in the world. One villager estimates there are 125 people, from children to seniors, who were born deaf from a genetic condition

The documentary zeroes in on a few of these villagers, the most interesting of whom is two-year-old Muhammed. Muhammed is given a cochlear implant and we follow his slow progress as he hears and learns to vocalize sounds for the first time.

Many people in El-Sayed, deaf or not, have learned to sign in a a unique way that has evolved in the town over the years. The film makes great use of sound and silence, frequently shifting from complete silence to moments of chaotic noise.

In one scene, the viewer walks around with little Muhammed as he listens to domestic sounds, such as the roar of his mother's vacuum cleaner or the repetition of the kitchen sink tap dripping, for the first time.

El-Sayed will be screened at the Royal Ontario Museum on Oct. 24 at 9 p.m. Producer Itay Ken-Tor will be in attendance for a post-screening discussion.

Jerusalem Moments 2009 is a collection of seven short documentaries by young Palestinian and Jewish directors that reflect the complexity of urban life in Jerusalem in the context of the intifadah. It will be screened Oct. 25 at Innis College at 3 p.m. Filmmakers Amber Fares and Daniel Gal will be in attendance for a post-screening discussion.

Children playing in El-Sayed

The movies, even the ones by Jewish directors, tend to have a Palestinian slant, some more so than others. Even The Little Western Wall, about religious Jews worshipping at a little-known part of the Temple Wall that skirts the Al Asqa Mosque, points out that Palestinians living in the region are not allowed to leave their homes when Jews are praying on Shabbat.

The general theme of these films seems to be how hard it is to be an Arab living in Jerusalem. By far the most interesting one is Bus, a six-minute short by Yasmine Novak that shows how difficult it is for Palestinians to go into and out of Bethlehem and other parts of the West Bank. Most of the dialogue in this short occurs in telephone conversations between Arabs on either side of the security fence trying to meet each other.

The Planet in Focus Film Fest runs Oct 21 to 25 and features 85 environmentally focused films from 25 countries. For tickets and schedules, call 416-967-1528, or go to www.planetinfocus.org

There are four films in the Land In Conflict program screening during the International Diaspora Film Festival (Nov. 1 to 8) In Z32, a former Israeli soldier is burdened by guilt over an operation in which two Palestinian policemen were killed. In Jaffawive, the seaside town of Jaffa is the wellspring of a socially conscious group of rap musicians made up of Arabs, Jews and multi-ethnic immigrants. The two other films are Jaffa, which screened recently at the Toronto International Film Festival, and On Hold, a poignant documentary about a young Palestinian couple who feel they have no future in Israel.

There is also a music program on Nov. 3 at the Revival Bar, 783 College St., which features an evening of music from the Middle East, including pieces with Jewish, Arab, Iranian and Pakistani influences arranged by New York City's Jewish composer David Amram.

Stars of musical theatre to perform at fundraiser

MICHAEL ISENBERG
CJN Intern

Songs and Celebration: An Evening of Songs from Jewish Composers, a fundraiser for the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company, will feature many stars of Canadian musical theatre.

The lineup includes the cast of Jersey Boys; The Sound of Music's Maria, Elicia MacKenzie; Theresa Tova; Michael Burgess and others.

A one-night-only event at the Jane Mallet Theatre in the St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts on Nov. 16, Songs and Celebration is "sure to be one of the most memorable performances of the company's history," said the theatre's co-artistic director, David Eisner.

"Never before have we done something like this," he said in a recent interview.

Hosting the fundraiser will be comedians Colin Mochire (of Whose line Is It Anyway?) and Deb McGrath (of Little Mosque on the Prairie).

"We are so fortunate to have a stellar group of performers and entertainers to host," said co-artistic director Avery Saltzman. "It's interesting, because our biggest names aren't even Jewish, which shows that, despite us trying to reach out to educate Jews about their roots through entertainment, ultimately we want to create a dialogue with everyone."

Saltzman and Eisner are hoping the fundraiser will raise the theatre's profile.

"We have over a dozen talented Canadian stars, each bringing a unique ability to perform, so it has to be a great show," Eisner said.

"It's easy for people to write a cheque and walk away, but to come out to a live event shows people's true support. And it's an incredible opportunity for them to see the great product we offer."

Saltzman and Eisner anticipate larger audiences this year, as Harold Green Theatre enters its fourth season.

The season opened on Oct. 13 with Sholom Aleichem: Laughter Through Tears, starring Theodore Bikel as he reflects upon the life of author Sholom Aleichem with comedy and music.

February features Yichud (Seclusion), a comedy about the struggles of an Orthodox couple's traditional lifestyle in a modern world. The season concludes in May with The Soul of Gershwin, a show that takes the audience on a journey through Gershwin's ethnic musical influences to the accompaniment of a klezmer band. The show features 23 of Gershwin songs.

Theresa Tova

"We really tried to cater to all levels of Judaism and cultural interests," Saltzman said. "Our goal is... to be a voice and home for the Jewish people of Toronto."

Eisner said that the Harold Green Theatre's presence in the city is a necessity.

"Montreal's had [a Jewish theatre] for a long time, and Toronto has so many Jews, it's about time they have a home too," he said. "And since not everyone likes the same material, we try to mix it up with some comedy, some history, music.

"Some productions are more political or religious, some are less. But every show has content that appeals and respects everyone so we can all become connected."

Saltzman sums up the theatre's mandate with one word: "accessible."

"It's about being a resource for people who need a means to gather and unite," he said.

"Certainly, we're here to entertain, but there's no better way than when we're doing something productive by educating as well."

Saltzman and Eisner, both actors for the past 30 years, have big plans for the theatre's future.

"We want a school for aspiring actors, a library of Yiddish music and history," Eisner said.

The co-artistic directors said they owe much to philanthropist Harold Green and his family, who donated both time and resources to help Saltzman and Eisner create the theatre.

But Saltzman and Eisner also know that much more support is required if they are to achieve their goals.

"We need more than a single family," Eisner said. "We need a community."

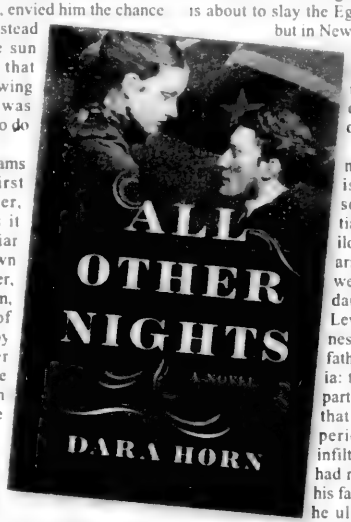
Dara Horn's new book is a daringly imaginative coup

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Dara Horn's third novel, All Other Nights, combines her trademark cleverness, depth of Jewish knowledge, and strong literary sensibility into a fast-paced adventure-intrigue in which Jewish characters make a significant difference in the American Civil War.

Jacob Rappaport, the 19-year-old son of a New York industrialist, joins the Union Army rather than accept the poor match his father, a well-connected businessman, has arranged for him through his business interests. As a soldier, Rappaport is immediately assigned a covert mission that only he can accomplish: infiltrate the South and visit Harry Hyams, the husband of his mother's sister, in New Orleans. His orders are to poison his uncle, who is planning to assassinate Abraham Lincoln.

Can he do it? Once in New Orleans, Rappaport visits the Jewish cemetery to mull over his impending mission. "If he had been a braver man, or a wiser man, he might have asked God what he was doing, or why he was doing it, or whether the dead around him, eternally burdened with their own remorse, envied him the chance to choose. But instead he looked at the sun and merely saw that the hour was growing late, and that it was time to continue, to do as he was told."



Joining the Hyams family on the first night of Passover, Rappaport finds it more than peculiar to be "sitting down to a Passover seder, the feast of freedom, with every part of the meal served by slaves." Another seder guest is the illustrious Judah Benjamin, the Southern Confederacy's Jewish secretary of state. After overhearing his uncle discuss the assassination plot with Benjamin, Rappaport surreptitiously pours poison into his uncle's wineglass. In Egypt, God is about to slay the Egyptian firstborns, but in New Orleans, a Jewish Union spy is the great avenger who makes this night different from all other nights.

Rappaport's next assignment is not murder but something potentially far more perilous: marriage. The army orders him to wed one of the four daughters of Philip Levy, a former business associate of his father's from Virginia: the Levy girls are part of a spy network that Rappaport's superiors want him to infiltrate. Although he had refused the match his father had arranged, he ultimately marries the "bashert" the army has chosen for him. The difference? The beautiful Eugenia Levy, though far from trustworthy, bedazzles him and wins his heart.

Is the author making a statement about the nature of filial duty as opposed to civic duty? About the nature of love and marriage as close cousins of espionage and subterfuge? If so, she wastes no time in moralizing: her concern is to tell a good story.

As the plot unfolds, Horn's well-wrought prose seems to crackle with cleverness as a dry log crackles in a hot fire. In this regard, her sophisticated word-play, sleight-of-hand narrative tricks and theatrical smoke and mirrors seem overtly Nabokovian at times. One of her silly villains is named William Wilhelm Williams the Third, reminiscent of Nabokov's Humbert Humbert. And imagine having a bizarre character who speaks only in palindromes and anagrams – intelligibly, entertainingly, with no sign of running out of things to say.

A well-researched if overly fanciful historical drama, All Other Nights impresses upon us a new awareness of Jews at the heart of American affairs long before the great immigrant hordes began to arrive in the 1880s. The story is masterfully composed but plot driven, the characters wittily drawn but not quite able to leap out of the page as genuine. Still, the book deserves to be applauded as a daringly imaginative coup and as the author's best novel to date (the others have been In the Image and The World to Come). It is, one hopes, a token of good things yet to come from this extraordinarily talented writer.

All Other Nights is published by W.W Norton & Co.

How to Be a Mentsh (& Not a Shmuck), by Michael Wex

Wex, the Toronto writer, raconteur and Yiddishist whose previous non-fiction book Born to Kvetch climbed to the top of the bestseller lists, now presents us with an equally learned and funny manual about how to be a human being – humane, considerate, and wise enough to do the right thing.

How to Be a Mentsh (& Not a Shmuck) The Secrets of the Good Life from the Most Unpopular People on Earth is an engaging, witty and wide-ranging discussion of morals infused by an assortment of talmudic and other material from Jewish as well as popular sources. The discussion begins with extended explanations on the linguistic derivation and meaning of both the Yiddish nouns in the title, which, like many Yiddish terms, have crept into the English language by osmosis.

Wex, a knight errant with a great arsenal of wisdom and knowledge at his disposal, slays his dragons with a variety of weapons. One moment he's quoting Abarbanel or Rashi, the next he's referring to the Rolling Stones' song Long Black Veil or discussing Miss Kubelik, C.C. Baxter and Mr. Sheldrake from the film The Apartment. He almost never fails in getting his meaning across in a colourful and entertaining way.

He's equal parts "Talmud chachum" and scatological comic, however, and frequently makes like comedian Lenny Bruce with the dirty words. His ability to apply both Jewish and popular wisdom, along with his breezy mixture of the profound and the profane, are sure to appeal to legions of his fans. How to Be a Mentsh (& Not a Shmuck) is published by Alfred A. Knopf Canada.

Author Michael Wex is appearing at the Jewish Book Fair on Thursday, Oct. 29, 8 p.m. Admission $10.

Save the Deli, by David Sax

Save the Deli: In Search of Perfect Pastrami, Crusty Rye, and the Heart of Jewish Delicatessen is an ode to "food, glorious food" as served in generations of those spicy Jewish eateries that won over our hearts even as they gave us heartburn. Sax travels the world in search of the perfect corned beef sandwich with a pickle on the side. He serves up a tasty history of deli in New York and major cities across the United States and Canada, including Toronto and Montreal. The book is a surprising offering from the usually-more-staid McClelland & Stewart publishing house.

Author David Sax is appearing at a preview event of the Jewish Book Fair at Caplansky's Deli, 356 College St. Thursday, Oct. 22, 5:30 p.m. Admission $5.

Israel & the Jewish World

The 100th Yahrzeit of Hatikvah's poet

Naftali Herz Imber, the poet of Israel's national anthem, Hatikvah, died 100 years ago on Oct. 8, 1909. His yahrzeit fell two weeks ago on the 23rd day of Tishrei. In remembrance, we republish an article written by CJN staff writer Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf that appeared originally in February 2008 as part of our special coverage for the 60th anniversary of the founding of the Jewish state.

• • •

Hatikvah, is Israel's national anthem and, most would say, the uniting hymn of Jewry worldwide. It's sung by millions across the world in schools, camps, community events, in the Knesset or almost anywhere Jews congregate for a formal occasion.

Though many know the words – whether by rote or by devotion – less know the rich history behind the song whose title translates into English as "The Hope."

Originally a nine-stanza poem, the song was written in 1878 by Naftali Herz Imber (1856-1909) – a wandering Jewish poet and writer from Galicia – and was first titled Tikvateinu ("Our Hope") as a reflection of his feelings on the founding of the city of Petach Tikvah that year.

The poem was first published as part of a collection of poems titled Barkai ("Morning star") in 1886 in Jerusalem.

Samuel Cohen, a Moldavian-born pioneer-farmer residing in Rishon Lezion, read Imber's poem and, inspired, set the words to music using a Romanian-Moldavian folk song Carul cu boi ("Cart and Oxen"), as a template.

According to historical accounts, the song soon after grew in popularity with the Rishon Lezion pioneers who sang it on their daily walks to work in the vineyards of Rehovot, and its fame quickly spread throughout the nascent Jewish state.

There is some dispute as to whether Cohen borrowed the tune from a composition by Cantor Nissan Belzer, but most research points to Cohen using his own Moldavian roots for inspiration.

Echoes of Hatikvah's central musical theme can also be heard in Czech composer Bedrich Smetana's 1874 symphony The Moldau, who similarly based this work on known Moldavian folk music.

According to various researchers, over the years Imber's words were alternately dropped or re-arranged by Jewish pioneers in Palestine, as they co-opted his sentiments to fit their new lives and aspirations in the Holy Land, leading to the eventual phrasing we read today.

Hatikvah was also sung at the First Zionist Congress in 1897. By the time of the Sixth Zionist Congress in Basel, Switzerland in 1903 – the last one presided over by Theodor Herzl – Hatikvah had become the de facto hymn of the Zionist movement, and was sung at all ensuing Congresses

The song was officially adopted as the hymn of the Zionist movement at the 18th Zionist Congress in Prague in 1933

Between then and Israel's birth in 1948, Hatikvah had, by virtue of its popularity among the chalutzim, become the unofficial anthem of Jewish Palestine under the British mandate.

When the State of Israel was declared on May 14, 1948, Hatikvah was jubilantly sung by a rejoicing Jewish People's Council at the Tel Aviv Museum.

In 1953, Imber's body was reinterred in the National Cemetery on Mount Herzl in Jerusalem. He had died in America after settling in New York near the turn of the 20th century.

Despite all this, Hatikvah was not formally adopted as the official anthem of Israel until 2004, when a Knesset vote finally entrenched the hymn as the country's national anthem.

The reasons for this 56-year delay were numerous. Among them were concerns voiced by Israel's Arab communities, who refused to accept the anthem because its core wording refers to the "nefesh yehudi" ("Jewish soul") and is considered exclusionary by some of the country's non-Jewish citizenry.

נפש יהודי הומיה.
ולפאתי מזרח קדימה
עין לציון צופיה.
עוד לא אבדה תקותנו,
התקוה בת שנות אלפים.
להיות עם חפשי בארצנו,
ארץ ציון וירושלים.

Naftali Herz Imber

Other reasons included movements by various Jewish parties to consider alternate songs for the anthem such as the popular Naomi Shemer composition, Jerusalem of Gold; Chaim Nachman Bialik's Birkat Am and Psalm 126 or Shir Hama'alot, which is traditionally recited after meals on Shabbat, festivals and special occasions.

Regardless, Hatikvah won out in a Knesset vote of 38-8 on Nov. 10, 2004 to become state law.

The CJN's retranslation of Hatikvah follows:

As long as a Jewish soul stirs
Deep in one's heart,
And we cast our eye
To the far horizon of the East and towards Zion,
Our hope will not be lost.
The hope of two thousand years,
To be a free nation in our own land,
In the land of Zion and Jerusalem.

Handful of Jewish skaters start NHL season

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

• WINNIPEG — It has oft been stated: getting to the top is easy; it's staying there that's hard. Well, don't tell that to any of the Jewish minor leaguers of the past two decades who have come close, but can't be included as established National Hockey League players. Today, that list includes only a handful of Jewish skaters, such as Mike Cammallen, Mathieu Schneider, Jeff Halpern and Eric Nystrom.

The just-missed-list includes former Ontario Hockey League scoring leader forward Todd Simon, who played a few games with the Buffalo Sabres and Doug Friedman a winger-enforcer with the Edmonton Oilers who had, as they say, a cup of coffee with Edmonton.

American Hockey League skaters Eric Himelfarb, Jeff Dessner, Bubba Berenzweig and goalie David Littman were more than decent but not good enough. Joining them on the outside looking in were East Coast Hockey League (ECHL) players Aaron Israel and Andy Silverman, and Central Hockey League goalie Aaron Vicker.

The Montreal Canadiens wasted little time when on the first day of free agency on July 1 they inked Richmond Hill, Ont., free agent forward Cammallen to a five-year $30 million (all figures U.S.) pact. This after Cammallen registered a career-high total of 39 goals and 43 assists with the Calgary Flames.

Cammallen, who was born to a Jewish mother, also played for the Los Angeles Kings. The 27-year-old media darling, who is 5-foot-9 and tips the scales at 185 pounds has, for good reason, been branded as a shoot-first-pass-second sniper who uses his assets of positioning and speed to find the open ice to get off a one-time shot. He can play both wings, too.

Playing with Brian Gionta and Scott Gomez, the trio has been labeled the "Smurf Line." In Cammalleri's first game of the regular season he set up a pair of goals in a 4-3 win over the Toronto Maple Leafs.

In August, the Canucks added experience on defence by signing 40-year-old Mathieu Schneider to a one-year pact. The Montreal native, months before he had become an unrestricted free agent, told his lawyer he didn't want to go anywhere but Vancouver and signed for, what would be by today's standards, a paltry $1.55 million. But first, Shneider had to pass his physical due to arthroscopic surgery on his shoulder.

There were as many as six inquiries regarding Shneider's availability and he could have demanded more money; instead he chose the city that would make his family happiest.

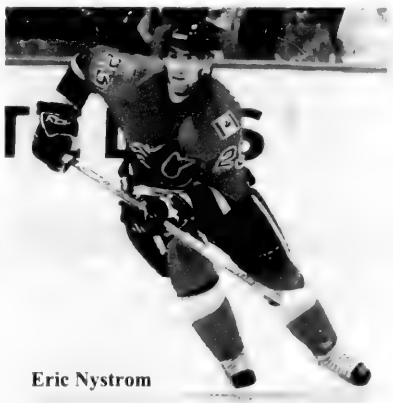
A power-play specialist, the 44th overall pick in the 1987 NHL entry draft joins his ninth team as he heads into his 20th campaign. He split last year between Atlanta and Montreal, recording a combined total of nine goals and 23 assists in 67 games.

Schneider is also a veteran of international competition, having represented the U.S. in two Olympic Games and two World Cups, winning the latter in 1996. The 5-foot-11, 195-pound Schneider won the Stanley Cup with Montreal in 1993 and appeared in two NHL All Star games.

Jeff Halpern managed only seven goals and nine assists in 52 games last season after missing the first 30 because of knee surgery. Now 33, Halpern played six seasons with the Washington Capitals, who signed him as a free agent in 1999, followed by a year in Dallas before arriving in Tampa Bay.

The 6-foot, 200-pound native of Potomac, Md., specializes as a penalty killer and forechecker on the third or fourth line. The son of Jewish parents who lost his mom about five years ago in a car accident in Florida, has amassed 122 goals and 175 assists in 649 games, despite being a defensive forward.

Eric Nystrom, 26, may not be as talented as his dad, Bob, who won four Stanley Cups with the New York Islanders, but his skill set is somewhat similar. Eric hung around the minors perhaps a little longer than he'd hoped, but he has finally arrived as an energetic, scrappy player with loads of perseverance. He is now a full-time NHLer who leads by example. The 6-foot-1, 197-pound winger, whose mom is Jewish, had five goals and five assists in 76 games last season. While scoring is not his forte, he keeps opposition skaters honest.



Eric Nystrom

Two young studs that are just on the cusp and ready to make it to the big time are defenceman Colby Cohen, 20, a 6-foot-3, 215-pound junior at Boston University who was a second round pick of the Colorado Avalanche, and New York Islanders' winger Trevor Smith, 24, a centre and left-winger. Smith, who was the Islanders' last cut only three days before the opening of the regular season.

He was sent down to the Bridgeport Sound Tigers of the AHL where last season he had impressive numbers, scoring 32 goals and adding 32 helpers.

Last year Smith, who is 6-foot-1 and 195 pounds, was called up due to team injuries. In his fifth appearance in seven games he scored his first NHL goal versus Calgary.

Cohen got noticed last winter when he scored the overtime winner that capped his team's stunning comeback in the championship game.

The Albany River Rats of the AHL have signed Winnipegger Jacob Micflickier, a forward who starred in college with the University of New Hampshire Wildcats. Last season in the ECHL with the Everblades of Florida, Micflickier scored 10 goals and had 14 assists in only 10 games and then moved up to Rochester of the AHL where he potted four goals and added 12 assists in 39 games.

Other minor pros to watch for are Oren Eizenman (ECHL Stockton Thunder), Adam Henrich (AHL Springfield Falcons), goalies Josh Tordjman (AHL San Antonio Rampage) and Robert Gherson.

Mezuzot exhibit on the move

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

"Upon the Doorposts," an exhibit featuring mezuzah cases created by members of the Pomegranate Guild of Judaic Textiles, Toronto, will be mounted in several Ontario cities in the next year.

The show, which closed at Baycrest in Toronto on Oct. 1, will travel to Hamilton, Montreal, London, and then back in Toronto.

"The mezuzot in our 'Upon the Doorposts' exhibit demonstrate that mezuzah cases can be made from many materials and can be very ornate," said Melanie Siegel, an award-winning textile artist who co-ordinated the exhibit.

She added that Jewish people have observed the commandment of placing mezuzot upon their doorposts for more than 3,000 years.

"When we fulfil this commandment today, we form an unbroken thread which binds us to our ancestors as well as to all future generations," said Rikki Blitt, the newly elected president of the guild.

"We especially owe Melanie [Siegel] a debt of gratitude for her vision, her dedication and her tireless attention to detail, which resulted in making this beautiful and professional exhibition of which we are all proud."

The mezuzot, which are knitted, fabric, glass beaded, mixed media and made of other materials, reflect the talents and diversity of the guild members.

"Upon the Doorposts" opens at Or Shalom Synagogue in London, Ont., on Oct. 22 for a run that ends Jan. 5. The exhibit will be on display at Hamilton's Temple Anshe Sholom from Jan. 10 to March 15; the Aron Museum in Montreal from April 11 to Aug. 1; and at Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto from Aug. 15 to Nov. 30.

Siegel said that discussions are in progress for the mezuzot exhibition to travel to venues in the United States.

For more information about the exhibit, e-mail info@pomegranateguild.ca or visit www.pomegranateguild.ca.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My husband Dave and I have raised two wonderful children.

Stacey, 24, just got married a year ago and lives in an apartment not far from us, and Adam, 27, lives right here with us, even though he has been working for three years. Dave and I tried to give the kids everything. We financed their education, fashion, and housing, and we're always there for both of them to fall back on.

The problem is they continue falling and we keep picking them up. I don't want this to come out wrong. We love our kids, but when does it end? Stacey still calls me before she makes any decision and she brings her laundry to me as well. Adam is still sleeping in his old room, I cook, clean and pick up after him. He's always on our computer and seems to have no regard for boundaries. I want them to be happy, but when is it over?

When is it Over?

Dear When is it Over?

Being a parent is never over. When you signed on to have kids, you signed a lifelong contract.

But there's a big difference between helping and enabling. By doing Stacey's laundry and holding her hand through every decision, are you helping her or enabling her? Assisting in every decision only reinforces her lack of confidence to stand on her own two feet. It may make you feel useful, but that is little gain for much bigger future pain.

Stacey has a husband now. He needs to be her partner in decision-making, not you.

As for Adam, he's actually a statistic. He is part of the "Boomerang Generation." These are adult children who return home after being away for their education or living away. They realize it's not so easy, so they revert to regrouping on your living room couch, and it gets pretty comfy on that couch. You need to motivate him to leave. This is where a little tough love may be needed. Don't make it so easy for him to stay. Set a deadline, and in the meantime, make him pay rent, buy his own computer, pay for Internet, food etc., and do his own chores.

It's your job to set boundaries of acceptable and unacceptable behaviour. Remember, you're doing this because you love them and want them to be strong, responsible, independent adults. That was your ultimate goal from the day they were born. Wasn't it?

Finding bliss in challenging times

Life can throw you some pretty tough curveballs, but how you react is often half the battle in dealing with them.

How much grace and patience, calm and serenity can you bring to the difficult time, and is it even possible to find meaning in the difficulty? We have faced such a difficulty of late with our son, who is suffering from a concussion and has experienced severe migraine headaches for weeks. Watching your child cry like a wounded animal is beyond difficult, and the whole experience has been extremely challenging.

So where is the bliss in all of this? I am writing a book called Finding Your Bliss, and must say that while all of this has been going on, I have thought, "How can I even contemplate the word 'bliss'? Bliss must be a luxury for those who have perfect health." And I wanted to toss the book out and stop writing.

Life Coach Corner
By JUDY SIBLIN-LIBRACH

That is, until I met someone who has also has a sick child, and in spite of her own challenges, she took the time to offer to hold my hand at our appointments and has sent encouraging e-mails and positive messages. How wonderful of her, and what a reminder to me that there are some spectacular people out there, and that we still have to find optimism, hope and blissful moments even in the most stressful times.

There are many people who have surprised us in a positive way, with their good wishes and phone calls, e-mails, concern, and offers to help. There are also those who disappoint us in difficult times. How do we turn that around and "judge to the good" and focus on the positives and be thankful for those?

I have learned that when things have been really stressful, a good joke and a good laugh can lighten the mood of any situation.

There's also perspective. "This, too, shall pass" is a wonderful adage when you are going through life's more challenging times. As well, prioritizing becomes all-important. What do I have to do for my family's survival right now and what can wait?

Other lessons I've learned: prayer and believing that it is all going to turn around is powerful and works beautifully. Visualizing a positive outcome goes a long way. I have also learned that breathing, meditating and just being still can help you revitalize, think and restore yourself enough to figure out what the next step will be.

Kindness has also played a huge role in this experience, and I am blown away by the kindness of administrators at my son's school, our friends and family, and even people we don't know that well. So where is the bliss in all of this? It's in the kindnesses; it's the smallest of things.

One night when my son was disappointed about some of the things he wasn't going to be able to do soon, such as play hockey, I shared a big disappointment that I once had and I told the story with lots of humour and acted out what happened. My son laughed and laughed. So that was his moment of bliss and subsequently mine as well.

As author Wayne Muller puts it, "When we come close to those things that break us down, we touch those things that also break us open."

Israel will not investigate the IDF: Netanyahu

By BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — An Israeli task force will present a series of recommendations for countering the Goldstone report and its implications.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has asked Justice Minister Yaakov Neeman to coordinate the task force.

At a meeting last weekend, Netanyahu said that the establishment of an independent committee of inquiry on last winter's war in Gaza is not under consideration.

"No soldiers or officers will be brought before a commission of inquiry," Netanyahu said.

The justice minister will head the task force that will include representatives of the Foreign Ministry, the Defence Ministry and the Israel Defence Forces. The team will offer recommendations for actions that can be taken on the legal and diplomatic-political fronts, as well as on public relations efforts that can be made internationally.

"There are different views on the actions that we should undertake," said a source in the prime minister's office. "What we will not do is clear, and now we need to find something else."

Jerusalem mayor is all business

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

Nir Barkat, the mayor of Jerusalem, has breathed new life into the city in his first year in office. In an exclusive interview with The CJN, the mayor reveals the biggest challenges still facing the city and his vision for the future, and he talks about his lifelong love affair with the eternal capital.

JERUSALEM — When Nir Barkat became the ninth mayor of Jerusalem on Nov. 11, 2008, he inherited quite a few problems.

The municipal council was made up of various factions with often opposing interests, and the city had a tenuous relationship with the new U.S. administration. As well, there was an infrastructural mess in the city centre caused by a poorly planned and mismanaged light-rail train project.

Nir Barkat

Jerusalem has more poor residents than any other city in Israel, and tension exists between Orthodox and secular residents and among both east and west Jerusalemites. Other problems include illegal construction in Jerusalem and friction in the Old City.

"Name a conflict, we have it. Big time," says Barkat, 50, in an exclusive interview at his office in city hall.

"But that's why I am here, because I believe we can change this…I sure don't do it for the money," he adds with a smile.

Since he entered into public service six years ago, the self-made, high-tech millionaire has refused to take a salary from the city.

The News in Brief

Canada

Niagara School Opens

NIAGARA FALLS, Ont. — Chabad Lubavitch has opened a school in Niagara Falls, Ont. Aleph Champ Hebrew school uses a colour-coded grade system similar to belts in Japanese martial arts. It has 13 students who meet every Sunday morning in office space over a Royal Bank north of the city's tourist area, the school's instructors, Rabbi Zalman Zaltzman and his wife, Perla, told the Niagara Falls Review. The school opened last month, but an official ribbon-cutting ceremony was held Oct. 18.

Claims Reopened

BERLIN — Nearly 70,000 rejected German Social Security claims from Holocaust survivors will be reopened. A monitoring group established by the Claims Conference and the German Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs will check claims turned down since 2002, with the oldest being processed first, the Claims Conference said Oct. 20. The re-evaluations follow years of lobbying and three court decisions this year that liberalized payment criteria for Germany's 2002 "ghetto pension" law, which applies to survivors of Nazi-occupied or incorporated ghettos who performed "voluntary and remunerated work." The Claims Conference joined other survivor groups to press for the changes because "inconsistent and overly strict interpretation of eligibility criteria by local German authorities resulted in widespread denial of claims." As of now, the kind of payment received for work in ghettos – such as money, food or clothes – is no longer a decisive factor, and remuneration need not have been provided directly to claimants. In addition, ghettos in Transnistria are to be covered.

Retrial Begins

SEATTLE — The retrial of the gunman in a fatal shooting at Seattle's Jewish federation in 2006 began last week. Lawyers for Naveed Haq will try to convince jurors that their client was legally insane when he charged into the Greater Seattle Jewish Federation, shot federation worker Pam Waechter dead and wounded five others. A jury in 2008 said it couldn't say if Haq was in control of his faculties at the time of the shooting, thus making him accountable for his actions.

Israeli Author Feted

ROME — An Italian city honoured Israeli writer David Grossman. Grossman and Italian architect Massimiliano Fuksas received the 2009 Exodus Award this month in La Spezia, the port where the ship Exodus was refitted before carrying Shoah survivors to Palestine in 1947. The award recognizes those involved in fostering dialogue and intercultural relations. Grossman was honoured as "a tireless advocate of dialogue as an essential tool for peaceful coexistence," while Fuksas designed the planned Peres Peace House in Jaffa.

Founder Slams Group

NEW YORK — The founder of Human Rights Watch rebuked the group for being overly critical of Israel. In an Oct. 20 opinion piece in the New York Times, Carl Bernstein said that in recent years, it has focused too much on alleged Israeli violations, while ignoring those in nearby countries where civilians are often used as human shields. Bernstein headed the group for 20 years, stepping down in 1998.

Obama To Speak

WASHINGTON — U.S. President Barack Obama will address next month's General Assembly of UJC Jewish Federations of North America. The Nov. 9 speech will be his first as president to a broad Jewish audience. Some Israeli figures and U.S. Jewish leaders have said Obama hasn't done enough to explain his positions on Mideast peacemaking.

Okanagan Community Installs Rabbi

KELOWNA, B.C. — The Okanagan Jewish Community Association held a ceremony earlier this month to install its new rabbi and to mark its induction into the Union for Reform Judaism.

Rabbi Lindsey bat Joseph

Some 90 guests came to the Oct. 16 Kabalat Shabbat service at the Okanagan Jewish Community Centre to formally welcome Rabbi Lindsey bat Joseph. On hand were Kelowna, B.C., Mayor Sharon Shepherd, MP Ron Cannan, MLA Steve Thomson, B.C. minister of agriculture and lands, and MLA Ben Stewart, B.C. minister of citizens' services.

Rabbi bat Joseph, who was spiritual leader of Temple Beth Ora in Edmonton from 1996 to 2007, was ordained by Hebrew Union College in 1996.

Clergy from local Catholic, Anglican and evangelical churches, as well as other dignitaries, also attended.

Volunteer Michael Landauer delivers Meals on Wheels

Seniors indirectly affected by financial downturn

Volunteers, caregivers less available to help out

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Many seniors are being indirectly affected by the downturn in the economy, says Lorraine Blass of Circle of Care.

"Our clients are typically older, frail people who are living on fixed incomes. They are not in the workforce so they are not affected by layoffs," said Blass, the agency's vice-president of community services and partnerships.

"We've lost volunteers who have had to work more hours or take on part-time jobs. Others step up to help out, but we can always use volunteers, especially for Meals on Wheels."

Inna Dantchenko, co-ordinator of Circle of Care's kosher Meals on Wheels program, said that even though grocery prices are going up, the meals are only $7.64, "and that includes soup, main and side dishes, dessert, bread and juice.

"Volunteers deliver the meals, but they do more than drop them and leave. They bring the meal, they shmooze a little, and they're trained to see if anything is wrong with the client – if they see any changes such as weight loss. They also check that there are no unopened meals in the refrigerator. Sometimes it is the client's only human contact of the day. It's not pizza delivery. It's a visit and a security check."

Israel is not alone

From the editor's desk...

The publication of the Goldstone Report last month, the massive publicity it engendered, the nasty anti-Israel propaganda it spawned and its adoption by the United Nations Human Rights Council have only reinforced gloomy feelings that Israel is virtually friendless in the world.

History has taught us, of course, that Israel's most reliable friend is, has been and will always be the Jewish people. But that has not been history's only lesson.

Israel has other friends, too.

Another example is the many nationals of other countries – Jews and non-Jews – who volunteered in 1948 and fought to help establish the newly born Jewish state. Some scholars believe that without the volunteers from overseas, Israel might not have prevailed against the much larger forces of the five invading Arab armies.

To be sure, today Israel relies only on itself and on its own defence forces to fight its battles. And those battles, alas, have been many.

But, despite the frequent anti-Israel votes in the United Nations, despite the frequent demonization of Israel in the fashionable elites of the far left and right in Europe, South and North America, Israel is not friendless in the world.

This is not merely wishful thinking, nor is it pollyannish self-delusion. It is statement of fact and worthy of reiteration for the sake of the truth, boosting our own occasionally flagging morale, and more importantly, for the sake of teaching this to our children and thus helping ensure the permanence of their connection to the Jewish state.

There were three poignant reminders last week that Israel is indeed not alone in the world.

Canada again, in two very publicly demonstrative ways, proclaimed its abiding friendship with Israel.

As reported in this week's issue of The CJN, during a visit with Israel's President Shimon Peres, Canadian Foreign Minister Lawrence Cannon emphasized the strong relationship between the two states.

Canada will continue "to stand beside Israel. Particularly against the threat of terrorism and comments that deny the Jewish state or the Jewish People. These are things that are foreign to Canadian values and to Canada itself," Cannon said.

In light of the Goldstone-related condemnations still ringing in Israeli ears and the unceasing inventory of harsh anti-Israel accusations constantly printed in fresh ink around the globe, Cannon's statement was especially fortifying.

The foreign minister was in Israel to attend the second annual President's Conference in Jerusalem. He took the opportunity to place the statement of Canadian support on the public record at this troubled and troubling time.

Earlier in the week, Canadian Armed Forces chief of defence staff, General Walter Natynczyk, in Israel for a three-day working visit with Israeli military officials, made similarly supportive statements. He met with the highest-ranking Israeli officers, Defense Minister Ehud Barak, and visited the Northern Command, the Southern Command and the Tel-Nof Air Force Base in central Israel.

In speaking of the common fight the two countries share against the forces of international terror, the general said: "I'm not sure if the Israeli standpoint is that much different than the Canadian standpoint, having had the experience in Afghanistan… We have really come to understand and appreciate what the Israeli forces have had to counter for quite some time and the techniques, the way and the procedures that the Israeli military has adopted and evolved over the past few decades." He added: "We're learning what we can adopt from Israeli forces that will enable us to reduce the risks to our people."

The importance of this very public demonstration of shared purpose should not be underestimated. It sent a welcome signal of friendship with Israel to the beleaguered Israelis at a critical time for Israel.

Finally, U.S. President Barack Obama provided a powerful expression of support and friendship.

There is a great measure of wariness toward the American chief executive among many Israelis and supporters of the Jewish state, who believe his foreign policies are either naive or dangerous or a combination of both.

Yet in a video message beamed to the large assembly at the commencement of the President's Conference in Jerusalem, he effusively praised the friendship between the United States and Israel, as "a bond that is much more than a strategic alliance."

Of course, one ought not place too much store or repose excessive faith in Obama's remarks. They were made, after all, in the context of effusive praise and greetings for Shimon Peres and the conference he had convened. We know what counts in international relations (as indeed, in life) are deeds, not words. The true measure of Obama's friendship toward Israel – as indeed that of any other global leader – will be seen in the delivery of policies in the arena of world politics, not in the delivery of aphoristic, comforting pronouncements in congratulatory speeches.

Still, at the same time, we must not deny the importance of statements such as those made by Obama, Natynczyk and Cannon. They are indicative of the fact that, in important diplomatic, bilateral, international ways, Israel is not alone.

Iran is Israel's biggest challenge since '67: analyst

There will be 'painful' consequences if Jewish state launches air raid to take out nuclear arsenal

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Iran's budding nuclear program is the biggest strategic issue Israel has faced in more than 40 years, says one of Israel's top reporters and political analysts.

Not since the tense days before the 1967 Six Day War has the Israeli government confronted such an onerous challenge, Yaron Deckel told a recent UJA Federation of Greater Toronto forum.

Deckel, the host of a daily radio show and the former Washington bureau chief for the Israel Broadcast Authority, noted that Israel is currently engrossed in a momentous debate on the wisdom of striking Iran's nuclear arsenal by means of a massive air raid.

"There are very serious discussions in Israel on how to deal with Iran," he said.

There will be "painful" consequences if Israel hits Iran's nuclear sites, he argued, alluding to Iran's retaliatory capacity. Iran supposedly has long-range missiles that can hit any point in Israel.

Deckel – the first Israeli journalist to interview the then-president of the United States, George W. Bush – warned that Israel would be hard-pressed to cripple, much less destroy, Iran's nuclear infrastructure, since it is buried deep underground and widely dispersed.

United Nations economic sanctions against Iran have not worked effectively, and it's doubtful whether two members of the UN Security Council, Russia and China, are ready to impose biting sanctions, he said.

Despite the looming Iranian threat, Israel is currently enjoying its quietest period in years, Deckel added.

Since the 2006 war in Lebanon and Israel's relatively brief invasion of the Gaza Strip last January, neither Hezbollah nor Hamas have fired rockets into Israeli territory.

And in the West Bank, terrorism has been virtually eliminated partly as a result of security co-operation between the Israeli army and Palestinian Authority police.

But on the political front, Deckel said, Israel's negotiations with Palestinian leaders have reached an impasse. "Talks are stuck at the moment."

By his reckoning, most Israelis consider U.S. President Barack Obama to be naive for believing that all political problems can be resolved through negotiations.

Citing an example, Deckel mentioned Obama's recent trip to Saudi Arabia, during which he asked for a meaningful political gesture in exchange for an Israeli settlement freeze in the West Bank.

Israel sought an air corridor over Saudi Arabian territory for its commercial airline flights to Hong Kong, but the Saudis flatly refused and Obama left Saudi Arabia empty-handed.

Yaron Deckel

Deckel said that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu faces two short-term challenges.

The first is to free Gilad Schalit, the kidnapped Israeli soldier who has been a Hamas prisoner for the past three years.

Israel will have to pay a very heavy price, in the form of released Palestinian prisoners, to free Schalit from captivity in Gaza, he said.

The second challenge is dealing with the repercussions of the Goldstone report, which accused Israeli forces and Hamas of committing war crimes in the Gaza war.

In his view, the United States will veto any UN resolution to refer Goldstone's findings to the International Criminal Court.

Defending the Gaza operation, Deckel argued that Israel had no alternative but to invade the territory. "No country can allow itself to be attacked by rockets on a daily basis without a response."

He said that while Israel did not deliberately attack Palestinian civilians, Hamas intentionally used them as human shields.

Anita Ekstein

Holocaust survivor honoured

MICHAEL ISENBERG
CJN Intern

Holocaust survivor Anita Ekstein will be honoured yet again for her commitment to educating people of all faiths about the Holocaust at the 2009 Ve'ahavta Tikun Olam Awards Ceremony on Nov. 8.

She is receiving the award of Outstanding Achievement in Remembrance at Ve'ahavta's annual Starry Nights Event. Other honorees include SkyLink CEO Walter Arbib and television producer David Shore, co-creator of the show House.

Ekstein is being acknowledged for her efforts in keeping the history and reality of the Holocaust alive, leading discussions mostly at schools, as she works to create advocates for peace.

"[The youth] is our future," she told The CJN. "It's up to them to decide what kind of world they want to live in, but they need to know what information they're making their decisions on."

Born in Lvov when the now-Ukrainian city was part of Poland, Ekstein, an only child, survived the Holocaust by living as a Christian in the home of pious Catholics. The Nazis killed her parents.

After being reunited with her aunt at the end of the war and reconnecting with Judaism after years of practising Catholicism, Ekstein made it her mission to inform people of all denominations about the severe effects of hate and intolerance.

"I'm living proof of the destruction," she said.

Battleground Jerusalem

It would be entirely incorrect to say that clashes "erupted" on the Temple Mount on Sunday, the second time this month that Israeli police have fought with Palestinians. The police did indeed fight with Palestinians. But the clashes hardly "erupted." They were not the explosion of a spontaneous combustion or a strike of lightning to dry brush. Rather, they were the deliberate result of incendiary incitement, of lies and provocations yet again by extremist Muslim religious leaders to their people to defend the Temple Mount against the "Jewish conquest," against the Jews, whom they charged, were planning to harm the mosques on the Noble Sanctuary, as the Temple Mount is known in Arabic.

Of course, the charges were fabrications.

But they achieved the result the clerics intended: rallying the masses, mostly Palestinian youths, to violence. They threw stones and oil at the police. The police fought back.

"Jerusalem's fate will be decided by holy war and resistance, and not by negotiations," Meshal said. "The Israelis want to divide Al-Aqsa Mosque, and this is not all. They want to hold their religious ceremonies in the mosque ... in preparation for demolishing it and building their temple there," he shouted. "Jerusalem is all of Jerusalem, not only [the east Jerusalem neighborhood of] Abu Dis. The Arabs and Muslims are [the city's] residents, and the Zionists have no claim over it," Meshal emphasized. And then he said: "I call for angry protests in Palestine and in the Arab world. Today, protests began in [the] Gaza [Strip], and we hope they will spread to the West Bank...We must send a message to the world: In light of the settlements and actions in Jerusalem, there are no negotiations and we must rethink our steps." The last few words were the key part of his message to the Arab world.

With these words, Meshal was echoing the hateful intransigence of Sheikh Ra'ad Salah, head of the northern branch of the Islamic Movement, who two weeks earlier told Ha'aretz that the clashes on the Temple Mount would last as long as Israel's "occupation" of the city and Al-Aqsa Mosque continued.

Israel's police commissioner, Insp.-Gen. David Cohen, who was himself on the Temple Mount to observe the fighting first hand, noted that "large groups of east Jerusalem Arabs are being encouraged [to violence] by the Islamic Movement leaders."

With Goldstone euphoria at the back of their sails, Palestinian leaders are opening a new propaganda front: Jerusalem, where they have orchestrated two sets of clashes in one month. Palestinian leaders have astutely noticed that when the Jewish state fights back, it is condemned by most of the world's international agencies. But if the Jewish state does not fight back, it will have surrendered its sovereignty, which is its enemies' ultimate aim.

25 years ago in The CJN

The Israeli cabinet unanimously approved defence minister Yitzhak Rabin's plan that would lead to Israel's withdrawal from south Lebanon. The plan called for co-operation from Syria, the South Lebanon Army (SLA) and the UN Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL).

Canadian Jews should boycott

A blatantly anti-Israel United Nations Human Rights Council endorsed the Goldstone report that accuses both Israel and Hamas of committing war crimes ("Goldstone make-over: Human Rights Council ignores Hamas," Oct. 22). At a special session, 25 of the body's members voted in favour of the resolution. Israel has flatly rejected the report as being factually incorrect but is still internally investigating the allegations made against it.

From time to time, various organizations attempt to organize a boycott against Israel, its citizens and its products. These attempted boycotts come from segments of the United Church, certain trade unions and various groups of academics in England and elsewhere.

The identity of the 25 countries that voted in favour of the resolution can be obtained on the United Nations website. It would be appropriate for Canadian Jews to boycott travel to those countries and stop purchasing their products.

Article undermines Jewish survival

The old sayings, "Protect me from my enemies, I will protect myself from my friends," and "With friends like this, we don't need enemies," are staring us in the face. I am referring to the Goldstone report on the war in Gaza, and even more damaging and dangerous, the outrageous approval and praise of intermarriage by Edgar Bronfman ("Intermarriage can benefit Jews, Bronfman says," Oct. 22).

I cannot understand why The CJN would carry an item that so undermines the very fabric of Jewish survival. To Goldstone and Bronfman, I quote the recent words so eloquently spoken at the United Nations by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, "Have you no shame? Have you no decency?"

Column contravenes Torah teachings

"Who should get tzedakah?" (Oct. 1) is a column that foments dissent between haredi and other Jews. The column is disturbing and inappropriate on many different levels. Advocating the denial of educational tzedakah to haredi families "who refused to act so responsibly and have numerous children" contravenes many Torah teachings. In addition, according to the column's logic, Jews of modest means should not be reproducing at all, as they would require a Jewish day school subsidy.

Everyone pays according to his means and need. The poor parents of one child may be subsidized as well as the "comfortable" parents of eight children. The recipients of tzedakah often repay the community in spades when they have the means to do so, and repayment may be in non-monetary ways as well. Resentment toward fellow Jews and withholding tzedakah for Jewish education are not policies that should be advocated in The CJN.

A rejoinder to Crook and Marcus

It is too bad that Barbara Crook and Itamar Marcus, in responding to my article, "'They' are taught to hate" (Sept. 17), carry on with the tired old line that only the Palestinians are taught to hate ("PA textbooks deny Israel's right to exist," Oct. 15). They do not address the many studies of Israeli textbooks, done by scholars at Hebrew University, the University of Haifa and elsewhere, that found Israeli texts to be mirror images of those produced by the Palestinians.

Crook and Marcus are only two of those engaged in the study of the Palestinian texts, and one should compare their findings to those of Prof. Nathan Brown of George Washington University, Ruth Firer of Hebrew University (with Sami Adwan of Bethlehem University) and that of the Israel/Palestinian Center for Research and Information. Their findings on the Palestinian texts are somewhat more optimistic. However, I don't doubt that both Palestinians and Israelis have a long way to go in cleaning up their texts, and that was the substance of my original article.

It is interesting to find in the Crook-Marcus critique itself charges against the Palestinians that could be easily levied against Israel. For example, some Palestinian maps do not show Israel. However, Israeli maps certainly do not show Palestine and, more to the point, most of them do not show the Green Line, Israel's pre-1967 borders. As Prof. Yoram Bar-Gal of the University of Haifa's department of geography ironically states: "My map is educational – your map is propaganda." Palestinians do not grant recognition to Israel in their texts, but that is probably more of the lamentable tit for tat of the entire conflict. To paraphrase a Jewish thinker of the the first century, let the partisans of the nation without sin throw the first stone.

Perspectives

Hope for an end to tears

Fourteen years ago, on the night of Nov. 4, 1995, 12 Cheshvan, Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin was killed by Yigal Amir. To commemorate Rabin's yahrzeit, we publish excerpts from the speech he delivered in the Knesset during the Yamim Nora'im (Days of Awe), eight days after the famous signing ceremony on the lawn of the White House.

In typically Rabin fashion, he explained honestly and forthrightly to the people of Israel the reasons for the risks he was taking in his effort to try to find a manner of peaceful coexistence with the Palestinians.

Alas, subsequent events showed that Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat never intended to pursue peaceful coexistence with Israel.

• • •

The government has today placed before the Knesset the Declaration of Principles on interim self-government arrangements for the Palestinians in the territories, the letters exchanged between Israel and the PLO, and the agenda for negotiations between Israel and Jordan. All the relevant documents have been placed before the members of the House, and there are no other secret agreements. The government seeks the approval of the Knesset.

For over 100 years, we have sought to build ourselves a home on earth, in the only place that was, is and will be our home, here in the Land of Israel. For over 100 years, we have sought to live here in peace and tranquillity, to plant a tree, to pave a way. For over 100 years, we have sought to live as good neighbours with those around us, without fear. For over 100 years, we have dreamt and fought.

In 100 years of settlement, this land has known great suffering and bloodshed. We who returned home after 2,000 years of exile after the Holocaust, we who searched for calm after the storm, a place to rest our heads, we extended a hand to our neighbours, and it was rejected time after time. Yet, our souls did not tire of seeking peace.

Our lives in this tormented land have been accompanied by rocket fire, mines and hand grenades. We planted, and they uprooted; we built, and they destroyed; we defended, and they attacked. Almost daily, we buried our dead. 100 years of war and terror hurt us but did not impair our dream. For 100 years, we have dreamed of peace.

This government, which entered into office over one year ago, has decided to try and put an end to the cycle of wars and terrorism, to try to build a new world for the country.

We said then: "We know very well that obstacles will stand in our path. Crises will erupt. There will be disappointments, tears and pain. But after it all, once we will have travelled this road, we shall have a strong state, a good state, a state in which we will be proud to be citizens and partners in the great effort.'

We said then: "The new government has made it a prime goal to promote the making of peace and take vigorous steps that will lead to the conclusion of the Arab-Israeli conflict. We shall do so based on the recognition by the Arab countries and the Palestinians that Israel is a sovereign state with a right to live in peace and security. We believe wholeheartedly that peace is possible, that it is imperative and that it will come."

On Jerusalem, we said: "This government, like all of its predecessors, believes there is no disagreement in this House concerning Jerusalem as the eternal capital of Israel. United Jerusalem will not be open to negotiation. It has been and will forever be the capital of the Jewish people, under Israeli sovereignty, a focus of the dreams and longings of every Jew."

We conducted negotiations with Syrian, Lebanese, Jordanian and Palestinian delegations. During the course of the negotiations, it became clear that the one and only address for the (Palestinian) delegation's decisions was PLO headquarters in Tunis. We could have buried our heads in the sand, we could have lied to ourselves, we could have deceived ourselves and said that Faisal Husseini, Hanan Ashrawi and the others represent the residents of the territories, and that we did not know or want to know who stands behind them.

We decided not to do so. We are well aware of who stands behind them, as are the Israeli people. We have no interest in denying it or desire to do so. This is a terrorist organization that has known no mercy, an organization that sent those who murdered the children in Avivim and in Ma'alot, those who shot the guests at the Savoy Hotel in Tel Aviv, those who killed innocent people in the bus attack on the coastal road, those responsible for hundreds of acts of terror, sabotage and murder. The hands of this organization have shed the blood of hundreds who are dear to us: the blood of Smadar Haran's family in Nahariya; the blood of Ofra and Tal, members of Abie Moses' family in Alfei-Menashe; the blood of innocent people whose only crime was that they were Jews.

We cannot choose our neighbours or our enemies, not even the cruellest among them. We only have what there is. The PLO fought against us, and we fought against them. With them, we are today seeking a path to peace.

We can lock every door, thwart every attempt at peace. We have the moral right not to sit at the negotiation table with the PLO, not to shake the hands of those who held knives, not to shake the hand that pulled the trigger. We had the power to reject, with revulsion, the PLO proposals and to then be unwilling partners to the continuing cycle with which we have been forced to live until now: war, terrorism and violence.

Former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin

However, we have chosen another course, one which offers a chance, which offers hope. We have decided to recognize the PLO as the representative of the Palestinian people for negotiations within the framework of the peace talks.

We knew, and we know today, about the heavy weight of the past. We did this only after the PLO, in letters to the prime minister, undertook the following commitments:

• To recognize Israel's right to exist and to live in peace and security.

• To settle all future disputes by peaceful means and through negotiation.

• To condemn and halt terrorism and violence in Israel, the territories and all other places. I want to report that, since the signing of the agreement, the PLO has not executed a single terrorist attack.

• To enforce the cessation of terrorism and violence among its members, and to prosecute those who violate this commitment.

• To view those articles of the Palestinian Covenant which deny Israel's right to exist and are inconsistent with the peace process as no longer valid, and to bring about their formal invalidation by the appropriate institution.

In Washington, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres signed in the name of the government of Israel the Declaration of Principles agreement for the interim period only. In this agreement, under which the Palestinians will be able to run their own lives, Israel secured the following points:

• United Jerusalem remains under Israeli rule, and the body that will manage the lives of the Palestinians in the territories will have no authority in this regard.

• The Israeli settlements in Judea, Samaria and Gaza will remain under Israeli rule without any change in their status.

• The jurisdiction of the Palestinian council will not extend to any Israeli in the territories of Judea, Samaria and Gaza.

• The IDF (Israel Defence Forces) will continue to bear overall responsibility for the security of the settlements, the Israelis in the territories, the security of every Israeli while he is in the territories, and for external security – that is, the defence of the current confrontation lines along the Jordan River and the Egyptian border.

• The IDF will be deployed in accordance with these missions throughout the territories of Judea, Samaria and the Gaza Strip.

• All matters related to the permanent solution will be left for negotiation to begin two years after the date set in the agreement, with the Israeli government remaining free to determine its positions as to the nature of the permanent solution. Namely, the Declaration of Principles leaves all the options open in this respect.

There will be early implementation of the interim period agreement in Gaza and Jericho, and the establishment of an elected Palestinian council which will conduct the lives of the Palestinians in the territories of Judea, Samaria and Gaza. The creation of the council will be effected only after we and the Palestinians agree upon its structure, composition and functions. The target date for the holding of elections is nine months from the entry into effect of the Declaration of Principles.

Alongside the great advantages of the anticipated peace, great risks also lie hidden. Our eyes are not so blurred that we do not see the risks, and we will do everything necessary in order to reduce these to a minimum.

At the same time, we believe that the risks are calculated and that they will not pose a threat to the security or existence of the State of Israel. In any event, the strength of the IDF, the best army in the world, stands at our disposal, if and when we should be tested, God forbid.

Our gaze is today turned toward the good opportunities; toward days without fear and nights without trepidation; toward a growing economy and a society that wants for nothing. If and when the peace which we so desire will arrive, our lives will be completely transformed.

On the threshold of a new year, after 100 years of violence and terror, wars and suffering, there is today a great opportunity to open a new chapter in the history of the State of Israel; there is hope for an end to tears.

This is the victory of Zionism, which has also won the recognition of its most sworn and bitter enemies. There is a chance that we will enjoy good neighbourly relations, an end to the bereavement which has visited our homes, an end to war…

Opinions

Cooking up history

Our heritage is buried in a diversity of objects that many of us do not value. Often minutes of meetings or grandma's diaries are discarded as worthless. Estate sales are full of memorabilia that should have been seen as precious for both family and community. History is embedded in these objects. But my concern in this column is cookbooks. There is information about our society in them but most people think they are for recipes only.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Nonsense.

Cookbooks are storehouses of information about our adjustment to other cultures, our travel patterns, our stories, our rituals and celebrations, our unique dietary patterns, our generational links, communal institutions and much more. Each cookbook tells a tale, the greasier the better.

The first level of information is the rich field of the history of Jewish food. We didn't always eat the same things. That history of diversity is important for our understanding of the health, agricultural, economic, social and environmental distinctiveness of the community. It also explains a great deal about our relationship with the outside world. In Italy, for example, the eggplant was known as Jewish food, since Jews from the east brought it to Italy.

The next level of information concerns our adaptation to the world around us and our Jewish identity. Some cookbooks tell of a particular family or community's history. Others are created for a particular institutional purpose or charity. Each cookbook tells a tale while teaching a cooking style. Embedded in the recipes and alongside those tasty dishes is a way of life that's often no longer available to us.

By examining the foodways in the book, the talented interpreter can put together a picture of life at a particular time. When did people get together? What did they eat? With whom? How did they celebrate? How typical was this? All these social facts fill the gaps that other historical data leave out. We want to know about the full lives of our ancestors, the full extension of our heritage. Without this kind of social history, we are left guessing, and we often guess wrong.

Cookbooks, especially original, local and private ones, provide us with new texts, primary texts of peoples lives. They're great commentaries on our complex social history and should be collected carefully. If you have some cookbooks and are willing to let them to be used in research or archived, send them to me. Don't throw them out. (Concordia University, Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies, 1455 de Maisonneuve W., Montreal, H3G 1M8).

The enemy within

It is rarely that I read a column by Patrick Martin of the Globe and Mail with anything but discomfort brought on by equal parts anger at his seemingly endless hostility to Israel, and dismay at how he portrays a country with, yes, many flaws, but the only viable democracy in that part of the world.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Reading his Sept. 26 column, "A hostile takeover of Zionism," detailing the way in which religious zealotry is alive and well in Israel was just dismay.

Martin describes a haredi community that is now linked with religious West Bank settlers and their supporters to become a strong political movement. They have ambitions to dominate Israel's cities and indeed its Knesset politics.

Martin asked: "Will Israel adhere to its founding secular values or will it become a theocratic Jewish state?" While this formulation is pretty stark, and hopefully far from predictive, recent events in Israel certainly seem to indicate that the haredi community has begun an aggressive attack on secular Israel, an attack that has led to violent clashes and demonstrations.

Hardal, the combination of the former National Religious Party members and the haredim, seeks to turn Israel into no less than a state governed exclusively by their concept of Jewish religious law.

Martin recounts events such as consecutive Shabbat riots against a parking garage open on Saturday near the old city; a riot when a haredi woman was arrested for child abuse; a woman beaten in Beit Shemesh for not being modestly dressed, and a man and woman attacked when the two sat next to each other on a bus.

Now comparing Israel to Iran, as Martin does, is too much of an overstatement.

Yet I wonder. The rise of a virulent religious fervour among haredim, influenced by inflammatory rabbis who harangue their youth and insist on the strictest possible separation of the sexes while preaching the goal of a religious state, is having a terrible effect on the country.

In simple terms, you cannot ram haredi Judaism down the throats of Jews in Israel who are not ultra. In fact, of course, you achieve exactly the opposite effect.

This crisis has been a long time coming. What to expect when there are various streams of public education, all mutually exclusive and often overtly hostile to one another?

What happens when neighbourhoods become monolithic and actively persecute residents who do not share the majority beliefs? We used to call those ghettos, and I moved to Canada to finally escape the black-white ghetto mentality of the U.S. Northeast. To see my beloved Israel become a horrid facsimile of that terrible time pains me no end.

What happens when entire political movements – because that is what they are, not religious sects at all – become obsessed with a messianic vision that makes every action of the state a test of religious correctness? Ironically, the haredim have long scoffed at the very existence of a Jewish state unless based on and governed by their particular beliefs. Now they form a coalition with a party that long sought to blend a progressive Zionist vision with halachic Judaism. Where oh where is Yosef Burg, known for his attempts to heal rifts between religious and secular Jews, when we need him?

The worst aspect of this has been the drive to control all matters of personal status, from cradle to grave, declaring some Jews treif or in effect kicking them out altogether.

All this violence and political manoeuvring will – has! – made haredim despised in the minds of secular Jews, as well as inimical to modern Orthodox Judaism, which follows the path of Rav Joseph Soleveitchik. The Rav strove to make Judaism and the modern world a compelling blend of scholarship, both religious and secular.

You may dismiss Martin as someone who is determined to find Israel at fault no matter what. But you cannot dismiss what is happening in Israel, often with financial and political support from abroad, so easily.

Assailed from without by those plotting our destruction, we often forget that destruction can come from hatred of brother for brother. We should rather be looking at the enemy within.

Ours is ceasing to be a house at peace with itself.

Holocaust Education Week 2009

Probably the most abhorrent expression of contemporary anti-Semitism is Holocaust denial. And in recent years, the world has experienced far too many examples of this travesty.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, the disgraced British Bishop Richard Williamson, British pseudo-historian David Irving, Ernst Zundel (now in a German prison), James Keegstra and too many others will themselves go down in history as proponents of this worst kind of revisionism.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Not surprisingly, Ahmadinejad will also not be happy unless Israel is wiped off the map. Some of his political cronies on the international scene, such as Venezuela's anti-Semitic President Hugo Chavez and deposed Honduras president Manuel Zelaya are also virulent anti-Israel proponents.

As part of what has been described as a bizarre rant, Zelaya recently accused Israel of attacking the Brazilian Embassy in Honduras with high-frequency radiation and toxic gases while he took refuge there. One of Zelaya's chief propagandists,David Romero Ellner, the director of Radio Globo in Honduras, stated in a broadcast that Hitler had been right and that it was unfortunate that he had not gotten the chance to finish off the Holocaust.

Why is Holocaust denial so evil? It denies the lives, suffering and deaths of six million innocent people murdered solely because they were Jewish. It is an obvious attempt to characterize the Holocaust as a Jewish conspiracy aimed at gaining sympathy, enhancing support of the State of Israel and seeking compensation for wrongs done. Moreover, Holocaust denial is an attempt to delegitimize Israel and its vital mission of survival in a hostile environment that extends beyond the Middle East to many capitals around the globe.

In an article called "Deep Denial: Why the Holocaust Still Matters," which was published recently in The New Republic and reprinted in the National Post, Michael Oren outlined how Holocaust denial is a strategic weapon in the armoury of anti-Israel proponents. He points out that "many [people] might be unaware of the extent of ignorance of the Final Solution… especially among youth. Confronted with the enormity of the horror, many young people today… react with incredulity, rendering them susceptible to denial."

All this underscores the importance of Holocaust Education Week – Nov. 1 to 11 in Canada. Many CJN readers will have seen the program of activities scheduled for the Greater Toronto Area distributed in a recent edition of this paper. The diversity of topics focusing on various aspects of the Shoah is impressive. These include personal testimonies of survivors, a screening and discussion of recent Holocaust motion pictures, musical responses to the Holocaust and a writing workshop for children of survivors. There is also consideration of the legal responses to hate propaganda and a discussion on how aging survivors confront their future, as well as a lecture on restitution for the Holocaust.

Another important theme is the vital question about how our children and grandchildren will remember and preserve the memory of the Shoah. This is addressed in one session on children born in Europe after liberation, survivors' children born in Canada and the following generation. And this important theme is also creatively addressed in the North American Hebrew-language première of And the Rat Laughed, an opera exploring the multigenerational power of memory that blends the Holocaust experience from past, present and future perspectives.

The Holocaust Education Week program is most impressive. One can only hope that the message and lessons taught and learned during this week are imprinted on the minds of Jews and non-Jews alike, and will endure as lasting memories in the narrative of the world's darkest hours.

In June of this year, Canada became a full member of the Task Force for International Cooperation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance, and Research (ITF), an international, inter-governmental organization committed to teaching future generations about the Holocaust. Canada has also established the National Task Force on Holocaust Research Remembrance and Education in order to share and enhance important Holocaust research and education initiatives in our country.

The antidote for Holocaust denial is widespread Holocaust education. This will not completely eliminate anti-Semitism, but it may curtail the deliberate distortion of historical fact and put to shame those who deny this pernicious chapter of 20th-century history and the Jewish experience in order to thinly masquerade their vile and atrocious hate.

The Kirshner File

Letter from Majdanek

It was appropriate, I think, that my visit to Majdanek, the German concentration camp in eastern Poland, occurred on a day when the sky was gray and ominous.

Adjacent to the city of Lublin, Majdanek is an eerie tableau of aging wooden barracks, guard towers, a gas chamber, a crematorium with an uncommonly high chimney and barbed wire fences. Even on a brilliantly sunny day, Majdanek would have sent chills down my spine.

Sheldon Kirshner in Poland

But on this afternoon of heavy clouds and distant thunder, signalling an approaching rainstorm, Majdanek was nothing less than repulsive and repelling.

Though originally a forced labour camp, Majdanek soon became part of a Nazi network of death camps whose raison d'etre was mass murder.

Along with Auschwitz-Birkenau, Sobibor, Belzec and Treblinka, Majdanek took its place as one of the key extermination centres of the Holocaust.

During its 34 months of existence, from 1941 to 1944, upwards of 150,000 people passed through Majdanek. Around 80,000 prisoners died here, half in its gas chambers and in executions. The remainder succumbed to starvation and disease.

Seventy per cent of its victims were Jewish, and the rest were Polish Catholics, Russians and Ukrainians.

Although Majdanek was a typical Nazi death camp in Poland, it was unique in several respects.

Rather than having been built in a remote area, the better to conceal its crimes, Majdanek's complex of structures could easily be seen from the outskirts of Lublin. Indeed, Majdanek's crematorium is only about 200 metres away from a bloc of drab apartment buildings.

One wonders how the burghers of Lublin related to the camp. Were they indifferent? Scared? Resigned to it?

In terms of the number of people who died or who were murdered here, Majdanek is overshadowed by Auschwitz-Birkenau.

Yet the biggest single-day, single-location massacre of Jews during the Holocaust apparently took place in Majdanek. On Nov. 3, 1943, in an operation dubbed Harvest Festival, SS and police units shot 18,000 Jews in a field just steps away from the crematorium.

It is hard to imagine brutality on such a scale. The murderers who killed these civilians so coldly had to press the triggers of their rifles 18,000 times.

Majdanek was the first major camp to be liberated by Allied forces, having been captured by the Red Army on July 22, 1944. Auschwitz-Birkenau was not liberated until the end of January 1945, while Bergen-Belsen was not liberated until April of that momentous year.

Such was the swiftness of the Red Army offensive that Majdanek's fifth commandant, Arthur Liebehenschel, had no time to destroy the camp, like his Nazi counterparts in Treblinka or Sobibor. Before the Nazis hastily evacuated Majdanek, they managed to dynamite parts of the crematorium, but the camp was largely intact when Soviet troops arrived.

My guide, Lukasz Myszala, said that the Red Army established a military base at Majdanek, using existing buildings as barracks. Prior to withdrawing, the Soviets dismantled some buildings, converted the camp into a museum and allotted empty fields to local farmers. Ninety of its original 270 hectares were set aside for the museum – which attracts about 100,000 visitors annually – and 75 of its 280 buildings were left standing.

Since the camp was not built for posterity, it must be continually maintained. "We constantly renovate buildings," said Myszala.

Until recently, preservation efforts were funded by the Polish government's ministry of culture. But lately, conservation efforts have been assumed by four bodies: the Polish-German Co-operation Fund, the Polish Scientific Research Foundation, the German state of Brandenburg and an evangelical group in the German city of Bielefeld.

Since Majdanek does not have its own conservation laboratory, like Auschwitz-Birkenau, outside specialists have been called in. The U.S.-based Ronald S. Lauder Foundation and Yad Hanadiv, an Israeli organization, have both contributed funds to preserve artifacts ranging from photographs of the camp to the standard striped-blue pyjama uniforms worn by prisoners.

Majdanek was constructed on the orders of SS leader Heinrich Himmler within the framework of Operation Reinhard, the plan to exterminate Polish Jewry. It was implemented by a subordinate, Odilo Globocnik, an Austrian of Slovenian descent who was born in Trieste. Late in 1939, following Germany's invasion of Poland, he was placed in charge of the SS in the Lublin district, which the Nazis initially intended to turn into an immense Jewish reservation.

Majdanek was built by Jewish forced labourers from Lublin and by Soviet prisoners of war captured after Germany's invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941. Many of the workers died of exhaustion.

In the wake of the Wannsee Conference in Berlin in January 1942, Majdanek was converted into an extermination camp.

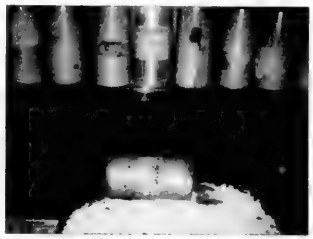
Jews from Slovakia, the Czech lands, Germany, Austria, France, Holland, Greece and Poland were killed in Majdanek.

The majority of Lublin's Jews were murdered in Belzec, 150 kilometres southeast of Majdanek. Sobibor was about100 kilometres to the east, while Treblinka lay some 100 kilometres to the northeast. Auschwitz-Birkenau was about 400 kilometres away, in southwestern Poland.

At first, the SS shot prisoners on the edge of the camp or in the Krepiecki forest, north of Lublin.

But early in 1942, a crematorium was installed, thereby ushering in a period of murder on an industrial scale. In the summer of 1943, when Majdanek was going full tilt, a bigger crematorium, equipped with five ovens, became operational.

Prisoners herded into the gas chamber were killed by either carbon monoxide or Zyklon-B gas. Zyklon-B, which left blue stain marks on the walls, worked faster, killing people within about 15 minutes. The Nazis preferred carbon monoxide, because it did not require hot and dry conditions and tended to be more stable.



Zyklon-B canisters and pellets

Visitors to Majdanek can step into the former gas chamber. The experience of finding yourself in a dark, confined space where thousands of people suffocated to death is unsettling.

The exhibits are horrific, from the empty Zyklon-B canisters and the mound of white pellets to the photographs of hard-eyed Nazi perpetrators.

Majdanek was guarded by 1,300 SS personnel, but they were aided and abetted by Ukrainian, Croatian and Lithuanian collaborators.

When the camp was liberated, the Soviets hanged a few war criminals and invited journalists on inspection tours so that Nazi crimes could be exposed.

Several decades later, in what was then West Germany, SS men who had worked in Majdanek were put on trial. Most of the culprits never faced justice and died of natural causes.

Midway through my tour, the sky grew dark and the camp was subjected to a torrential downpour of a magnitude I had last seen in the Amazon jungles of Brazil.

But no amount of lashing rain could wash away the crimes that were committed in Majdanek.

From Bernie Madoff to Montreal's Earl Jones, news stories abound of "financial advisors" who offered trusting clients the promise of safe investments with a high, consistent return, only to be revealed later as fraudsters operating elaborate Ponzi schemes that ultimately left many investors penniless.

Trust alone is not enough. That's why it's so important to have an understanding of what you are investing in. How safe is the investment? How transparent is the process? Can you lose money? Is there any potential for fraud?

When you invest in the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund, you'll find the answers you need. Answers that will satisfy whatever concerns you may have.

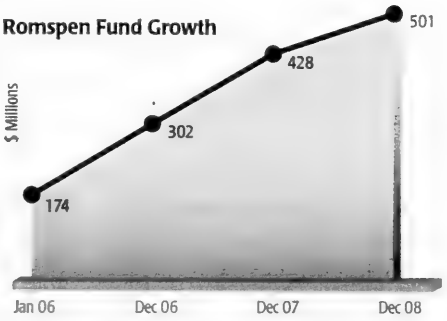
Here's why.

The Romspen Fund is invested exclusively in short-term mortgages on Canadian commercial real estate (96% are first mortgages). Each mortgage loan is considerably less than the value of the property as originally appraised.

More importantly, however, is the fact that the investment process is entirely transparent. Each and every one of the Fund's 115 mortgages is registered on title to the property that secures the loan in a government regulated registry system. Each provincial registry is accessible to the public allowing anyone to verify any investment the Romspen Fund makes. Every mortgage is also posted on our website for investors to view.

For additional reassurance, investors should know that the Fund has been audited since inception by KPMG, the fourth largest accounting firm in North America.

As more and more frauds are exposed, investors are seeking the peace of mind that comes with knowing their investment in the Romspen Fund is secured, offers an attractive monthly return, and cannot be part of a fraudulent scheme. Last month alone, this confidence resulted in the purchase of more than $16 million of additional Fund units by 100 new and existing investors.



Many of our investors are financial experts. Many more are not. What they have in common is a willingness to take a little time to understand how their money is invested. Come to this month's seminar and learn more about the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund. It's a very simple and smart thing to do.

Circle of Care expands transportation route

Dantchenko said volunteers delivered about 65,000 meals to 700 clients over the past year. "If they find something wrong, or no one answers the door, the volunteers have a strict protocol to follow. There is a lot of volunteer training."

Meals are delivered Monday to Friday, she said, but there are frozen choices that clients can keep in their freezer for the weekends. "The meals are all prepared at Baycrest, and there is a huge variety. We also cater to our clients' needs. We can provide for renal diets, gluten-free and diabetic diets, and we can also have the meals pureed if necessary."

> 'We've had an increase in demand because clients' children are working more or looking for work and can't take their parents to appointments'

Emmy Gershon of Circle of Care's transportation department said she also sees clients being indirectly affected by the economy.

"We've had an increase in demand, because clients' children are working more or looking for work and can't take their parents to appointments."

She said that the agency recently expanded its transportation route to include downtown hospitals. "Service is now available as far north as Centre Street, and south to Mount Sinai, Princess Margaret, Toronto General, Woman's College, St. Michael's and Toronto Western hospitals."

She said that clients phone for an appointment and are charged "considerably less than a taxi. They are picked up by uniformed drivers – the drivers are not volunteers – who have been trained in first aid and CPR. The drivers come to their door and help clients in and out of the car."

Transportation costs are subsidized by the Central Local Health Integration Network and the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Gershon said.

She said the agency now operates nine vans and provides 17,000 rides to more than 1,300 clients annually. "We started the downtown service – we get about one or two calls a day for downtown hospitals – because our clients were having difficulty getting to appointments. Their children are unavailable, and taxis are too expensive."

Blass said Circle of Care has seen an increase in the demand for home-care workers, because many adult children no longer have the time to look after their parents' needs.

"We've found that the caregivers are working longer hours, and have less time to give their parents. This is directly impacting the seniors."

The agency's philosophy is to keep people at home and independent as long as possible, she said, "and all our services are geared toward that goal. If people have meals, transportation and home support, that is a big help."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

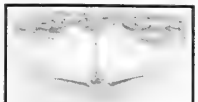
Rashi's message to useful idiots

By RABBI MOSHE STERN



Rabbinic Reflections

We begin the new cycle of Torah reading with the story of Creation. Its well-known first Rashi asks: seemingly, the Torah, being a guide and book of laws, should have begun with the first mitzvah given to the Jewish nation, as described in Exodus, Chapter 12, the institution of the calendar and the laws of Passover.

So why begin with Creation? In order to remind the nations of the world that all belongs to God and that a tiny sliver of land – Israel – was given to the people of Israel as an inheritance, forever.

Now are we so naive as to think that the Arab world will hear this Rashi and give up their distortions?

They started many years ago, with the Arab propaganda machine constantly feeding the Arab public – and the rest of the world, if they cared to listen to disinformation regarding the establishment of Israel, the 1948 War of Independence, the 1967 Six Day War, the 1973 Yom Kippur War and the 1982 Lebanon War, up to and including the recent war in Gaza.

The Arabs, the story goes, were just minding their own business when, in 1948, big bad Israel established a state, attacked the Palestinian people and, by threat of annihilation, chased the Palestinians out of their homeland.

In 1967, the story goes, big bad Israel, with its military, strategic and physical might, decided to continue the process of taking over the Palestinian homeland and chasing out the Palestinian people. In 1973, it was more of the same – except, of course, that Israel started that war on Yom Kippur, Judaism's holiest day, and in '82, the campaign to chase out the Palestinian people and conquer the territory was extended to Lebanon and the Lebanese people.

This pack of absolute untruths and ugly lies continues to be "the party line" in PLO circles and in Arab countries. Arab newspapers, television programs and books all carry these untruths in one way or another. The natural result of these lies has been the enormous, lifelong hostility felt by much of the Arab world toward Israel and the Jewish People.

In fact, in some cases the lies went back to World War II, with questions of whether there actually was a Holocaust. The great Arab peacemaker, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, the "moderate" PLO leader, in his published book, The Other Side: The Secret Relationship Between Nazism and the Zionist Movement, wrote that the Nazis may have killed less than one million Jews and that the Zionist movement was a partner in the slaughter of the Jews.

I'm afraid that the Rashi quoted above won't impress the Arab and the anti-Semite. My feeling is that this Rashi was meant more for some of our fellow Jews who have become "useful idiots" (as Lenin put it) for our enemies. We have them in abundance on campus and in the so-called literary world, people who think they can curry favour with Jew-haters by denigrating their own people and the State of Israel.

If they exposed themselves to Torah learning and gained insights into their past, they might have a catharsis of attitude and a change of heart.

Beyond the technicalities

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

We live in a most technical age. I'm not just referring to the wonderful advances of science, but rather to our emphasis on the technicalities of life. For many lawyers and accountants, it's their bread and butter. Hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars are paid to lawyers, accountants, bankers and the like to figure out complex schemes that fit within the technical aspects of the law, at times with little regard (or worse) for the moral and social implications of such activities.

There's no doubt in my mind that advances in technology have helped create a climate in which we tend to focus on technical issues in all spheres of life. Jewish law – which deals with the realities of life and thus is, to a certain limited extent, influenced by them – has felt the impact of this emphasis on technicalities.

Technicalities are important and nowhere more so than in Jewish law. Yet technicalities are functional aspects of Judaism meant to enable implementation of the vision that Judaism has for its adherents and for the world at large.

Jewish law is full of technicalities. Pricing policies, competition, investing, labour relations, negative advertising, taxation, zoning laws are all subject to detailed laws codified throughout the centuries. These monetary aspects of Jewish life for years have formed the core curriculum of the great talmudic academies (helping to explain why so many who studied Talmud make great lawyers). Yet the essence of conducting our dealings ethically may not be reflected even by one who is in full compliance with all laws.

We all know that one can be in technical adherence to the law but still be morally wanting. It's impossible for any legal system to cover every eventuality, leaving much room for behaviour that is in the word of our sages "exempt in the laws of man but guilty in the eyes of heaven." Examples include allowing our children to damage the property of others, or hiring someone to commit a crime (one is only liable for damages one directly and personally causes). This, Nachmandes claims, is the essence of the Torah's admonition "to do the straight and good."

Included in the above is the obligation to act lifnim meshurat hadin, beyond the letter of the law. Though it sounds like an oxymoron, there are well-established views in our tradition that one can be compelled to act in such a manner. This obligation usually refers to giving up on a potential monetary claim.

The classic talmudic case involves needy workers who accidentally damaged – and Jewish law obligates one to pay for accidental breakage of another's property – the merchandise they were working with. While a court would have to rule in favour of the wealthy employer, proper moral refinement would require the employer – if he is of means – not only to forgo his claim, but to actually pay the workers for their time on the job, even though the net effect of their work was negative. Interestingly, this idea seems to be the norm in our modern-day workplaces, where negligent workers are paid up until the point that they're relieved of their duties.

These thoughts come to me as I read about yet more examples of public figures possibly abusing the trust placed in them, whether it's the eHealth fiasco in Ontario or the mayor of Toronto not letting his constituents know the true extent of the cost of the sick-day program for city workers. Often when people are caught doing something questionable, their immediate response is that no laws were broken. While that may be true, it's often beside the point. Such protestations have the capacity to reframe what in reality is an important moral issue as a legal one.

Remembering the Pogrebishche pogrom of 1919

By GARY NACHSHEN
Special to The CJN

This year marks the 90th anniversary of the wave of pogroms that claimed tens of thousands of Jewish lives in the Ukraine in 1919. The purpose of this article is to recount the story of one of those pogroms, the Pogrebishche pogrom of August 1919, an event that played an indelible role in the history of my family.

Guest Voice

Pogrebishche is a very small town located about 100 kilometres southwest of Kiev, in central Ukraine. It was also the birthplace of my late grandfather Yancel (Jack) Nachshen, in January 1900.

Earlier this year, I travelled to Ukraine to visit Pogrebishche and a number of nearby towns where my ancestors once lived. My visit was first and foremost a journey of personal and family discovery. However, it also spoke to some larger issues, most particularly the changing nature of the fraught Jewish-Ukrainian historical encounter and the means by which historical memory is or is not transmitted between generations.

In the early 1900s, Pogrebishche and most of the rest of the Ukrainian lands formed part of the Russian Empire. The region fell within the infamous Pale of Settlement, the zone to which Czarist decree confined the empire's five million Jews. Jews represented anywhere from 20 to 80 per cent of the population of the pale's various shtetls. Most of the rest of the population was ethnic Ukrainian, Russian or Polish.

The author at the Holocaust Memorial in Pogrebishche

The family in which my grandfather grew up was part of Pogrebishche's Jewish minority. His father was a devoted follower of the chassidic rebbe who led the Boyaner dynasty in the nearby region of Bukovina, but with the outbreak of the Russian Revolution in 1917 and the Civil War that followed, their world of peace and piety fell apart.

By early 1919, order had broken down throughout Ukraine. Anarchy reigned as countless military forces advanced and retreated throughout the land. Broadly speaking, the principal contending civil war forces could be divided into four groups.

First, there was the Red Army of the Bolsheviks, led by Lenin and Trotsky, who had seized power in Russia proper to the north in October 1917 and were seeking to impose Communism in the remainder of the former Russian Empire. Second, there was the White Army, led by General Anton Denikin, which aimed to restore Czarist rule. Third, there was a nascent independent Ukrainian regime, the Directory, led by the self-styled military commander Simon Petliura. Finally, there were any number of local atamans (warlords) professing various forms of socialism, anarchism or Ukrainian nationalism and varying degrees of loyalty to Lenin, Petliura or others.

As the year 1919 wore on and military discipline grew ever weaker, all of these forces engaged to a greater or lesser degree in bloody pogroms against the civilian Jewish population. While pogroms had been common in the Pale of Settlement since at least the 1880s, the earlier waves had been marked more by damage to property than loss of life. This was not so in 1919 – the death toll in a single pogrom in early 1919, perpetrated by Directory forces in the town of Proskurov, totalled some 1,500.

This fresh wave of pogroms struck terror in the Jewish population. In Pogrebishche, 19-year-old Jack Nachshen and many other youths resolved to form a Jewish self-defence unit to protect their homes and families. Decades later, he recounted to me how Bolshevik leaders in the nearby city of Berdichev put out the word that they were prepared to distribute weapons to Jewish self-defence groups as a way of bringing the Jewish population of the region over to their side in the struggle for control. Indeed, the Red Army had a number of Jewish officers, and its troops engaged in many fewer pogroms than did its adversaries, so this "offer" had the ring of plausibility to it. My grandfather and 120 other boys from Pogrebishche thus eagerly set out to collect their weapons so as to defend their homes.

But the offer turned out to be only a cruel trick. When they arrived at the Bolshevik headquarters in Berdichev, the boys found themselves unwittingly inducted into the Red Army itself and sent out as cannon fodder in the civil war raging around them.

My grandfather's military career didn't last very long. Most of his cohort of 120 were dead within weeks, and the remainder, including him, were stricken by the typhus epidemic then raging through the Red Army. Of no further use to the Bolsheviks in his severely weakened state, he was discharged and sent home.

Which is how Jack Nachshen found himself back in Pogrebishche in August 1919. Shortly after my grandfather's return, the Ukrainian nationalist leader Petliura passed briefly through Pogrebishche as his army raced east to occupy Kiev before the White Army's General Denikin could advance into Kiev from the south. Now the role of Petliura in either condoning or combating the pogroms of 1919 has long been a matter of tremendous contention between Jewish and Ukrainian activists and historians, especially after a Russian Jewish refugee assassinated Petliura in exile in Paris in 1926 to "avenge" the pogroms and was then tried for murder by a French court. (The jury eventually acquitted him in what could be seen as an early case of jury nullification by a panel that was shocked by the bloody evidence of the pogroms put before it.) But when recounting these events to me many decades later, my grandfather was categorical: at least in August 1919 in Pogrebishche, Jews remained safe while Petliura was present.

After Petliura left later that month, though, circumstances changed dramatically for the worse. A local warlord who went by the nom de guerre Zeleny – he was not much older than my grandfather and spouted a vague mixture of anarchism and nationalism – occupied Pogrebishche, and his band of marauders fell upon the local Jewish population. Two of Zeleny's men found the typhus-ravaged Jack Nachshen and his closest friend hiding in an attic. One of the men was about to shoot my grandfather when the other stopped him, saying "Why bother? He's so sick, he'll be dead soon anyways." And so as fate would have it, they left the boy who would become my grandfather alone while slaying his friend in cold blood before his very eyes.

Some 375 Jews were massacred in Pogrebishche by Zeleny's men in just two or three days in late August 1919. Estimates of the total number of pogrom victims in 1919 across Ukraine vary widely, but a range of 50,000 to 100,000 dead would probably not be too far off the mark.

At the time, this wave of pogroms was considered perhaps the greatest spilling of Jewish blood in recorded history. A Red Cross official published a book titled The Slaughter of the Jews in the Ukraine in 1919, and thousands rallied and marched around the world in protest. But of course the death toll from the pogroms of 1919 was eventually dwarfed by the millions of civilian Ukrainians and Jews who died in the Holodomor (famine) and Stalinist purges of the 1930s, and the Nazi Holocaust of the 1940s. And so it is that the pogroms of 1919 in Pogrebishche and dozens of other Ukrainian towns are all but forgotten today.

Jack Nachshen eventually recovered from typhus, and in 1920, he escaped the chaos of wartorn Ukraine into Romania, where he spent four years before securing a Canadian visa and immigrating to Montreal in 1924. During his later years there until his passing in 1996, he told and retold his story to us, thereby preserving by a slender oral thread the narrative of the Pogrebishche pogrom, which has otherwise effectively slipped from living memory.

My visit to Pogrebishche earlier this year had a bittersweet quality. On the one hand, while a spare and poignant memorial to the 2,000 local Jewish victims of the Nazi Holocaust has been erected, nothing comparable can be found to mark the 1919 pogrom. Indeed, the Nazis and their henchmen all but wiped out the town's Jewish population – only five Jews survived World War II and returned to live in Pogrebishche in 1945. Today, just a single Jewish resident remains.

Yet all the people I met and to whom I introduced myself as the grandson of a former Jewish resident greeted me warmly, right up to the mayor himself. Pogrebishche's Jewish cemetery has been well tended and preserved over the years by several generations of a kindly local Ukrainian family. And if the town gives off a somewhat forlorn vibe after nearly a century of war, turmoil and Soviet oppression, at least today it stands at peace.

JTS chancellor reaches out to recently ordained rabbis

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The rabbis who will "speak to" young people who have grown up playing video games are rabbis who are at home in their culture of technology, said the chancellor of the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) at an Oct. 13 program titled "Not your zayde's rabbi."

Speaking at Beth Tzedec Congregation, Arnold Eisen was joined by Rabbis Adam Cutler, 27, and Jarrod Grover, 28, who responded to his remarks. The two rabbis were ordained this year and work at Beth Tzedec and Beth Tikvah Synagogue, respectively.

As well, noted Eisen, rabbis for the coming generations must love Torah, and have a "passionate, unquestioning, irrational love and faith in the Jewish people," as well as an openness to the sciences, the arts and the larger culture.

Eisen said that one of the benefits of the current financial crisis is that he and his colleagues have had to think a lot about what is essential to rabbinic education.

Among the aspects he deems important are mysticism and the historic role of women in Judaism.

JTS has a full-time professor of Jewish mysticism, Eisen said. Rabbis need to be familiar with the subject in order to speak to young people exploring spirituality outside of Judaism and who question why their own religion doesn't offer anything similar.

"And how does Jewish law change and respond to new circumstances?" Eisen asked. "I would submit that only if you know those things are you prepared to carry your tradition authentically forward."

Also, he said, "you've got to trust [your students] and give them the ability to know how and what to change."

He lauded the school for having done "an excellent job" of teaching rigorous academic studies.

The students need rigorous learning, Eisen said. "But if we are not helping our young rabbis with their own spiritual development, we're failing them, and failing the congregations that are going to hire them."

Arnold Eisen

JTS has started to make that shift "in a systematic way" in the last few years, he added. "What you want is rabbis who know how to wrestle, and can help their congregations wrestle."

As well, he said, rabbis have to know how to fundraise, and "what a budget looks like" in order to serve their congregations well.

But above all, Eisen said rabbis have to know how to bring people together and build community.

Given that the intermarriage rate in the United States hovers at or near 50 per cent, Eisen said he was horrified to learn that a student could graduate from JTS without ever opening a New Testament.

An increasing number of the Jewish population is Orthodox, and Conservative Judaism "is going to shrink as a percentage of the Jewish population," Eisen said. "Does that mean it doesn't count? Is less valuable? I don't think so."

Eisen said he sees Conservative Judaism as "a precious asset of the Jewish people… no less authentic than Orthodoxy. I regard it as something we dare not lose in this day and age."

Rabbi Grover said he feels great "that we have a chancellor who gets it. He understands the changes that are taking place in the Jewish world, and how the seminary needs to respond."

But Rabbi Grover noted as well that he doesn't think his generation "has the same loyalty to Conservative institutions" that the previous generation did.

Many congregants at Conservative synagogues choose not to send their children to a Conservative day school, even if they think it's good, he noted as an example. "We've got to make sure our product is the best."

Rabbi Cutler said that his demographic group is "very much a different generation" of Jews. "I live my life on Twitter and Facebook," he said.

"We need to speak differently… We need to create public rabbis who can speak not just to Jews but to Canada, America and the world. We need to have a public face. It cannot just be a public face of the far right wing [of Judaism]. I think we can still hold that centre."

Ekstein stresses importance of Holocaust education

"We're still living it today, and that's the easiest way for people to understand [the Holocaust]. There are conflicts with Darfur, [Iranian President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad. They may not be as bad, but they could be if not stopped."

Ekstein stresses the importance of educating Jews and non-Jews alike about the Holocaust.

Jewish children grow up hearing about the Holocaust more than non-Jews, because the entire Jewish people was persecuted, so it's necessary to teach the non-Jews, she said.

But she added that because Jews have an intrinsic connection to the Holocaust, many feel they understand and know about it when they really don't.

"Hearing experiences from a survivor is a different experience for everyone to learn from, so it helps to teach those who need it," she said.

Ekstein has demonstrated her tireless efforts to educate, having led nine March of the Living trips. She's getting ready for her 10th in 2010. She was also national chair of March of the Living Canada from 2006 to 2008, a role in which she was a visible presence as a leader.

"It's important to engage with the people and be around them so they can appreciate what happened and how we can avoid it from happening again," she said. "I still get letters from students of previous trips, so I must be doing something decent."

Ekstein has received numerous prestigious awards for her achievements including the Elie Wiesel Holocaust Remembrance Medal.

And while she said she's grateful for the recognition from Ve'ahavta, when asked about its importance and how it differs from the other awards, she said it's "merely the most recent."

"I don't need awards," she explained. "My satisfaction's in helping young people and seeing them develop, to build a tolerant, peaceful society."

Ekstein said the influence of a survivor is more powerful than anyone else.

But she said she's also aware of the difficulty that lies ahead when all the survivors have passed on.

"I'm hoping that people who have been on trips and have been inspired will carry on our work," she said. "It won't be the same, but there's no other choice."

At 75 years of age, Ekstein said she has no plans to slow down. She still intends to keep giving talks and leading trips to Poland.

"As long as I have the strength, I will continue."

Israel encouraging Jews to leave West Bank, says Shilo resident

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Israeli government is implicitly encouraging Jews to leave the West Bank by cutting vital security services, charges a Jewish resident of Shilo.

Cuts have been so extensive that many Jewish settlements have had their security apparatus compromised, said Marc Prowisor in an interview. He was here recently to speak at Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue, having been invited to Toronto by a friend, Rabbi Gedalia Zweig.

Prowisor, a 46-year-old American immigrant who made aliyah in 1978, lives in Shilo, a settlement of 285 families about 45 kilometres north of Jerusalem.

Originally from Philadelphia, he is the security projects director of One Israel Fund of America, which supports Jewish settlers in the West Bank, captured by Israel in the Six Day War.

Now a reservist in an infantry unit, and formerly a paratrooper in the Israeli army, Prowisor oversees security projects for the One Israel Fund in the West Bank and the western Negev region. From 1996 to 2006, he was the chief army security co-ordinator for the Shilo area, which lies between the Palestinian towns of Ramallah and Nablus.

An Orthodox Jew, he said that Israel has reduced the budget for communication equipment, maintenance of security vehicles and subsidies for rock-proofing windshields on cars and trucks. The government has also curtailed training for community defence.

"They're doing this to encourage the migration of Jews from Judea and Samaria and to discourage new people from coming in," he said.

In his judgment, these cuts jeopardize basic services that the government is duty-bound to maintain, regardless of politics, and endanger Jews.

According to Prowisor, the budgetary reductions, while potentially dangerous, have not caused an exodus from settlements, nor have they discouraged prospective settlers.

The cuts started when Ehud Olmert was prime minister and continue apace under Prime Minister Benjamin (Bibi) Netanyahu's administration.

"I don't trust politicians," said Prowisor. "I see Bibi as a friend, but as a sincere friend I can only hope. Bibi wants to preserve his career. I've learned not to be surprised by what politicians do."

He added, "We saw [Ariel] Sharon become a destroyer of settlements. Anything is possible."

Prowisor said that the Shilo region – which contains 11 Jewish settlements and seven Arab villages and has a population of about 16,000 evenly divided among Jews and Arabs – has become increasingly volatile since the outbreak of the second intifadah in September 2000.

"We have stonings, Molotov cocktails and a few shootings in the Shilo area each day. Only a fraction of the incidents are reported in the press. Do people have to be hurt for something to be reported?"

In the past nine years, six Jewish residents of Shilo have been killed and many more have been wounded in terrorist attacks, he disclosed.

"Until 2000, our area was extremely quiet. This was coexistence, though we had our incidents. All this changed overnight. Today, it's hostile and becoming more hostile."

Claiming that Jewish settlements in the West Bank are part and parcel of Israel and the Jewish homeland, Prowisor said that the Israeli government must never give them up.

"It's very important for Jews abroad, in the Diaspora, to come out to these communities and see what they are. They should understand our history in the area. We're not these evil occupiers. I would like people to put themselves in our position."

In an allusion to Israel and the Diaspora, he said, "We're one people, and we have to start behaving that way. We have enough enemies."

Asserting that a settlement freeze is a non-starter, Prowisor said, "It's not human. How can you say to people, 'Don't grow.'"

Far from being "nut cases," Jewish settlers are normal. "We work and we play. We have art and culture. Unfortunately, due to the media, the world doesn't see us this way. We're part of Israeli society. We're one people. We're not separate."

Prowisor doubts that a two-state solution will ever see the light of day. "I don't think it can happen. We'll have to learn to live together, and that'll bring about a solution."

He regards the Palestinians as a "non-people." As he put it, "The Arabs of Judea and Samaria are not a separate entity. They're like the Arabs of the Galil."

Asked if the Palestinians have a right to statehood, he replied, "That's a loaded question. They should have a right to rule themselves within the framework of autonomy."

He has no faith whatsoever in the mainstream Palestinian leadership. "If they were serious about peace, they would have accepted Olmert's offer of 98 per cent of Judea and Samaria and eastern Jerusalem."

He believes that a third, more violent Palestinian uprising is brewing. "Mentally, many people are prepared for it, though they're not stockpiling weapons. The Arabs will be very, very sorry if they open up with a third intifadah." When asked to elaborate, Prowisor said that the Israeli army will hit back hard.

Prowisor claims that U.S. President Barack Obama is naive. "I find it hard to believe that just because of Judea and Samaria, there is no peace in the Middle East. Things have been taken way out of proportion. Obama should leave us alone. We'll manage. It's embarrassing to think that people are so small-minded."

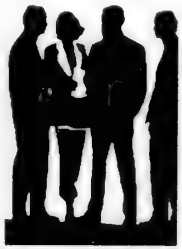
From Jewish day school to Hong Kong and back

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Shoshana Chaim spent two years teaching in Hong Kong before returning to Toronto in 2007.



"They are our teachers..."

Since that time, she says, she is much more sensitive to individual and cultural differences among her students and their families.

Chaim – whose surname is pronounced like "chain" but with an "m" at the end – teaches a class of 21 full-day senior kindergarten students at Leo Baeck Day School's south campus, housed at Holy Blossom Temple.

From 2002 to 2005, she taught at Bialik Hebrew Day School, pioneering its full-day senior kindergarten program, and also serving as a grade 7 and 8 basketball and volleyball coach.

The 30-year-old Montreal native has always enjoyed spending time with children, she told The CJN. When she was younger, she babysat, tutored and worked at summer camp.

"There's something exciting about seeing kids learning something for the first time," said Chaim, who has a one-year-old son.

A graduate of McGill University's education program, Chaim left Montreal in 2002, the year she married her husband Adam, now a physical education teacher at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's northern campus. They met in Montreal, coaching basketball together when he was a student teacher and she was a Marianapolis College student.

A lesson from the teacher: "When you take risks and allow yourself to experience unique situations, you're going to enrich your present and also your future."

A member of a women's hockey team with a background in martial arts, Chaim co-owns a fitness-related business called Target Trainers with her husband. Both are certified as personal trainers.

The Hong Kong stint "kind of fell in our lap," she recalls. "We had a house, we had a dog, we had great jobs. We gave everything up to go experience the world."

The couple worked at at the Canadian International School of Hong Kong, where a friend had told them of job availabilities. Adam taught physical education and Shoshana taught "preparatory," a class with children of senior kindergarten age.

She found that, despite some similarities, there were cultural differences and values among the families of her students.

Because of that, she said, she takes more things into consideration when dealing with individual situations. "Not every student is the same. I think I'm much more sensitive to that."

She strives to maintain a "compassionate but strict" attitude in the classroom. Also, she added, "I like to think that I'm fun. Children need to learn through play and through fun. They need to see school as exciting."

Recently, she had her students put together an "All About Me" project, collecting items that represent who they are.

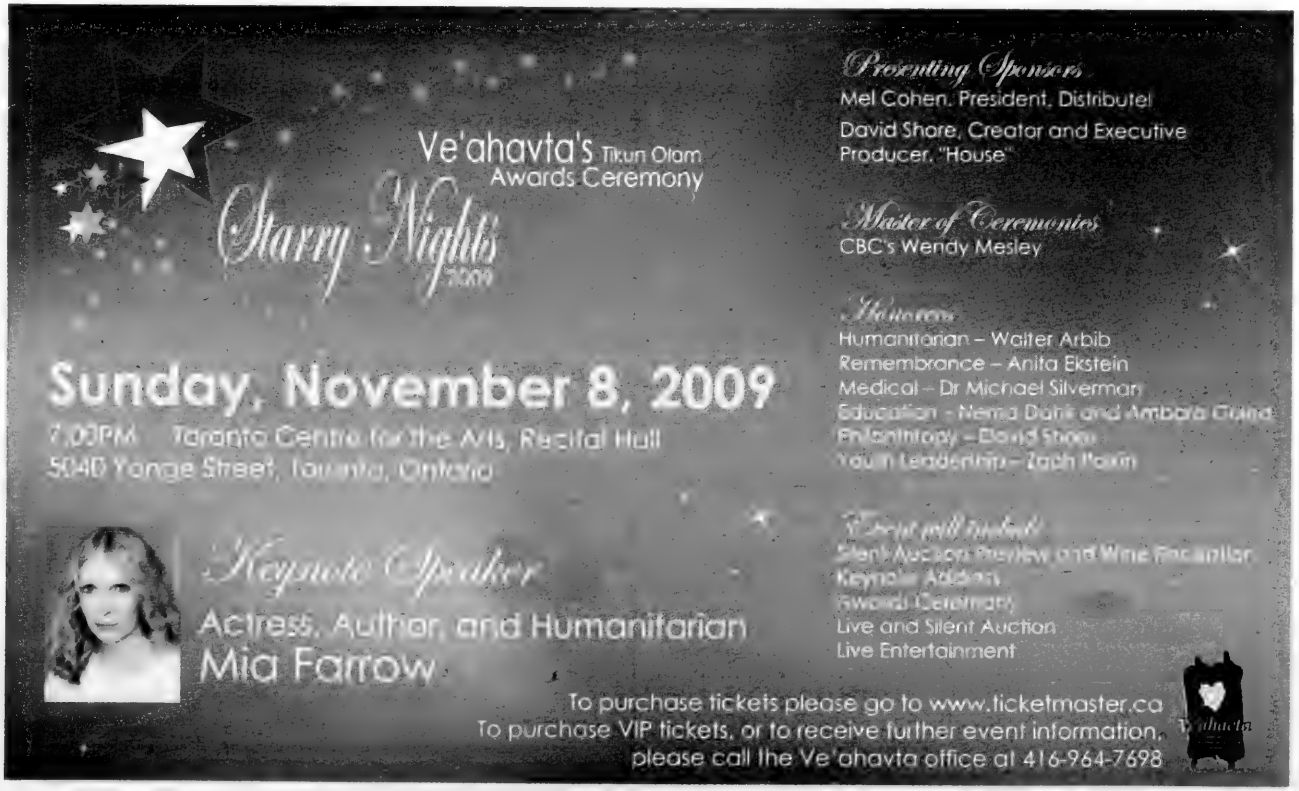
A key goal of the endeavour was getting the students to ask questions, she said. Because Leo Baeck – like the school in Hong Kong – uses International Baccalaureate teaching methods, there is an emphasis on getting students to ask meaningful questions to help them understand more about the subject they're studying, Chaim said. "We get them to be thinkers and inquirers."



Toronto's Jewish community loses beloved volunteer, philanthropist

Michael Rosenberg z'l personified tzedakah

Michael Rosenberg z'l

By Daniel Horowitz

On Saturday, October 17, a bright light within Toronto's Jewish community dimmed with the death of Michael Rosenberg, a man synonymous with tzedakah, selflessness and menshlachkeit.

A Holocaust survivor, Michael, who was 83, was a fixture at the Lipa Green Centre for Jewish Community Services for years in his role as chair of both the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto and United Jewish Appeal Societies Divisions. Survived by his beloved Lily, Michael was a proud father of two, grandfather of five and great-grandfather of one.

"Toronto's Jewish community has lost an integral component of what makes it one of the Diaspora's best," says UJA Federation Board chair David Koschitzky. "Michael was one of those who truly understood the nature and meaning of tzedakah by doing whatever he could to make our community stronger, while avoiding the spotlight. To Michael, it wasn't about ego; there was no job too big or too small for him to take on himself. His passion for community and for members of the Societies was palpable. Despite his years, Michael continued to roll up his sleeves for the Jews of Toronto, Israel and around the world with the energy and conviction of a man half his age. I will miss this true gentleman."

"As chair of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, I had the good fortune to work closely with Michael for the past two years," says Honey Sherman. "Michael personified all that is so great about Toronto's Jewish community through his kindness, compassion, sense of humour and passion for the cause. He never failed to lift others to higher heights by sharing one of his entertaining stories, or just by flashing one of his infectious smiles."

Michael, who came from a strong, proud Zionist family in Poland, arrived in Canada in 1948 at the age of 21.

"Coming here began the process of rebuilding my life – learning a new language and adjusting to a new lifestyle," Michael wrote in his Book of Life story. "The Jewish community of Toronto reached out to me, giving me a helping hand and a warm welcome wherever I went. In 1949, I brought my wife, Lily, also a survivor, to Canada from Germany, where I had first met her."

After selling his business in 1988 and retiring, Michael decided it was time to repay the community that gave him a new home and a new start in life.

Besides his dedication to UJA Federation, Michael lent his talents to Jewish National Fund, Yad Vashem, B'nai Brith Canada and Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada, a group dedicated to seeking a measure of justice for survivors.

"I had the incredible privilege of serving with Michael for three years on the Board of the Material Claims Conference and in his capacity as the president of the Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada. Michael, though in his early years saw his fill of grief, emerged from the Shoah an honest and kind man," reflects Bernie Farber, CEO, Canadian Jewish Congress. "He was admired by all who came into contact with him and his gentle demeanour, coupled with his determination for those less fortunate, stood him well and was a great benefit most directly to Holocaust survivors in dire need."

"I first met Michael over 35 years ago when he was an active B'nai Brith Lodge leader and I was the executive director of BBYO here in Toronto," reflects Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO, UJA Federation. "During that time, and continuing later in his volunteer work with UJA Federation, it's hard to imagine a volunteer as dedicated and as committed as he was. In an era of fundraising galas, tribute dinners, raffles and tournaments, Michael Rosenberg moved against the grain. He showed the power of the conversation, the call, the meeting, the trust of leadership when community leaders reach out, look people in the eye and, one on one, pursue true philanthropy in support of our fellow man. For me, he was an inspiration and we will all miss him for that."

"I have given a gift to the UJA Campaign for many years, and as I began to think about the future, I established a fund with the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto," wrote Michael. "Now there will always be something that my grandchildren and great-grandchildren can point to and say, 'that was built by my grandparents.'" And for a man like Michael Rosenberg, what could be a more fitting legacy?

Doctor's group aims to divorce politics from medicine

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Dr. Stephen Samuel, the chair of Doctors Against Racism and Anti-Semitism (DARA), said that the attempted ban of Israeli doctors from a breast cancer conference in Egypt last week "is a typical example of political interference in medicine and science."

The conference, held in Alexandria, Egypt, from Oct. 21 to 27, and organized by the Susan G. Komen for the Cure, a breast cancer advocacy group, took a controversial turn when the Egyptian health minister, Hatem el-Gabali, sent a notice to invited Israeli doctors that they would not be granted access.

After Jewish advocacy groups, including the Anti-Defamation League, urged the Susan G. Komen foundation to insist that Israeli doctors be allowed to attend, the foundation released a statement that said: "We launched a diplomatic effort to ensure they would be able to participate. I am pleased to report that our efforts led to confirmation that all advocates would be welcome to participate in the events."

DARA, a Toronto-based grassroots non-profit organization that seeks "objectivity and freedom from intimidation in science, medical journalism and academia," released a statement that said that the attempted exclusion of Israeli doctors from the conference in Egypt is proof that for some, the "pursuit of medical and scientific truths… is secondary to their discriminatory and xenophobic sentiments."

Samuel said it is these kinds of incidents that has led to the founding of DARA, which held its first conference, called "The Medical and Psychological Impact of Terrorism," at the University of Toronto on Oct. 18.

More than 150 people attended the conference that included addresses by Dr. Frank Sommers, a Canadian psychiatrist and Nobel laureate, Dr. Fuad Khan, a Harvard-based psychiatrist and Dr. Eran Regev, a maxillofacial surgeon from Israel who has treated terror victims.

Dr. Stephen Samuel

Samuel said the conference in Toronto and the group's mandate in general is meant to raise awareness, "to pursue truth and to divorce politics from medicine and science and to struggle against intimidation, extremism and distortion of truth in academia.

"Until not long ago, we assumed in medicine that the influence in politics and conflicts and so forth will not result in editors allowing their journals to be used for political purposes and thereby allow distorted publications," he added.

But recently, anti-Israel articles have appeared in medical journals such as the Lancet and the British Medical Journal.

This year, the Canadian Medical Association Journal (CMAJ) ran two pieces that were critical of Israel's role in the recent war with Gaza.

Samuel said that DARA's mission is academic in its approach, and that it doesn't focus solely on anti-Jewish and anti-Israel issues.

"We are professionals and we are not a political organization, we are not another Jewish advocacy group. We have members who are non-Jews, members who are Bahais, who are Hindus, who are Catholics. Two of the seven speakers [at the conference] were Muslims," he said, adding that the topics focused on the physical and psychological consequences of terrorism all over the world.

Samuel said that unfortunately, politics and propaganda often find their way into medical and academic conferences.

He recalled attending a lecture held at U of T in May called "Medicine, War and Occupation: The Case of Gaza."

Samuel said one of the speakers, Dr. Ghada Karmi, presented false statistics to argue that the occupation by Israel of Gaza and the West Bank has resulted in the deterioration of the health care of Palestinians.

"I had done my research before I went to this conference and got the statistics the night before from UNICEF and the World Health Organization on the infant mortality rates and on the age and sex standardized mortality rates per 100,000 people, which is a measure of health standards, in Israel and all of the Arab countries and in the West Bank and Gaza," Samuel said.

"She gave numbers of infant mortality rates, which were lies. So when I pointed out to the room that I had the real statistics and I asked her why she distorted them, I was immediately attacked as a racist."

This, Samuel said, is exactly the kind of thing DARA is fighting against – and not only when it comes to Israel.

"If we see that there is discrimination being practised that is related to medical care in Afghanistan, that women are not allowed to be doctors, or that women are being denied health care because they are not allowed to be outside without a man accompanying them, as is the case in Saudi Arabia… We will comment on it."

He added that he hopes DARA will motivate other professional groups to organize themselves in a similar fashion.

"If we can get lawyers against racism and anti-Semitism, teachers, accountants – various professional groups – the government and the media will listen."

The Executive, the Board and the entire Congregation wish to express their heartfelt condolences to the entire family of our late, beloved and respected

Albert (Al) Wise ז"ל

Al served the Shul for 80 of his 95 years with a passion that will never be equaled or forgotten. He lived for the Shul. He was predeceased by his beloved wife Ann Wise. As a couple they epitomized the essence of what it means to volunteer with all your heart and only in the best interests of the Shul. We have lost an irreplaceable energy that those who knew Al will appreciate and understand.

The respect we have for Al, who dedicated so much of his life to the Shul, is enormous.

His memory will live on in the Synagogue forever. He leaves a void that cannot be filled.

Non-egalitarian shuls have a place: USCJ head

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The new executive vice-president and CEO of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism says that even though the "vast majority" of American Conservative congregations are egalitarian, he "absolutely" sees a place in his group for non-egalitarian synagogues such as those in Toronto that have left the umbrella organization, and three of the four in the city that remain affiliated with it.

Rabbi Steven Wernick took over the leadership of the USCJ, which comprises some 700 North American congregations, from Rabbi Jerome Epstein on July 1, when the latter retired after 23 years as its head.

The new CEO, a 42-year-old former congregational rabbi, said in an interview that he hears frequently "that pluralism is one of our primary values, and we need to be a big tent. And I think we can be a big tent, and we are a big tent."

He spoke to The CJN last week at Shaar Shalom Synagogue, where he had just met with local executive directors of synagogues. He also met with Conservative rabbis and lay leaders in one of a series of initial visits to about a dozen cities.

Rabbi Steven Wernick

Last year, Adath Israel Congregation, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue and Beth Tzedec Congregation left the USCJ, citing mainly financial concerns but also philosophical differences.

In late 2005, those philosophical differences came to the fore when Rabbi Menachem Creditor, then based in Sharon, Mass., said at the Conservative movement's biennial convention that allowing non-egalitarian congregations in the movement was immoral.

The following December, further differences were highlighted when the movement's committee on Jewish law and standards endorsed conflicting opinions on homosexuality, one of which allowed commitment ceremonies for gay and lesbian couples, as well as the ordination of gay and lesbian rabbis.

Rabbi Wernick said that despite differences in religious practice within the Conservative movement, Conservative Jews share a set of values and the same approach to Jewish text study. "They may have different conclusions, but the process is the same.

"Toronto is a significant Jewish community, and United Synagogue as an international organization has to understand what the issues are and be able to respond to them in meaningful ways," he said.

"It's important for this new face to come here and talk about a new vision and explore opportunities for not only strengthening our ties with those congregations that remain a part of United Synagogue, but to explore the opportunities that exist for building bridges with those that are not."

Although noting it's early to say what direction the relationship between the USCJ and Canadian congregations will take, Rabbi Wernick said that he thought there was "a lot of goodwill for engaging in a process."

Paul Kochberg, president of the USCJ's Canadian region, lauded the rabbi for recognizing "that change is needed in the organization immediately… He's been the driving force behind change that has been discussed for years."

Among the changes he was referring to is the creation of six districts out of the 15 USCJ regions, which has already begun and is expected to be finished by the end of June 2010.

As part of the reorganization, the Canadian region will merge with three northeastern U.S. regions to form the USCJ's new northeast district.

The Canadian regional office in Toronto is expected to remain open, Kochberg said.

Efforts to reach Harvey Schiller, president of the Canadian Council of Conservative Synagogues – which was initially formed by the three breakaway congregations plus Beth Sholom Synagogue – for comment before The CJN's deadline were unsuccessful.

Rabbi Wernick – who has been credited with revitalizing Philadelphia's Adath Israel, the synagogue he led from 2001 until this year – had every intention of continuing as a pulpit rabbi, but said he couldn't turn down the opportunity to "have a voice in shaping the future of this movement that I love… I had to be part of that."

Musing on the parallels between his Philadelphia shul and the Conservative movement, whose numbers are shrinking across North America, he cautioned that the USCJ is not a synagogue and the revitalization process must be different.

That said, he noted that each institution has faced the same issue: determining its purpose, and asking how to best organize to become "something really special and unique."

The son of a Conservative rabbi, Rabbi Wernick – a native of Philadelphia – spent his junior high and high school years in Winnipeg, where he was active in the movement's youth arm, United Synagogue Youth. Losing his mother at age 15, he experienced community in an intense way through the support of his USY group.

He recalls that time as "kind of a seminal moment that continues to inform every aspect of who I am as a human being."

Haifa U to honour human rights activist

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

For his commitment to peace in the Middle East and for his philanthropic activities in Canada and Israel, Dr. Michael Dan will receive an honorary doctorate from the University of Haifa at a tribute dinner next month in Toronto.

A human rights activist, Dan is a major benefactor of the University of Haifa and the Canadian Museum for Human Rights, as well as a member of the board of directors of Canadian Friends of Haifa University.

With a diverse student body of 18,000, the University of Haifa is a mosaic of Jews, Arabs, Druze and immigrants who come together to share knowledge, study and socialize. Proceeds from the Nov. 15 event, titled Partners for Peace, will support the university's recently established peace and conflict management studies program, which aims to give a new generation of leaders the capacity to promote more effective approaches to conflict resolution.

Michael Dan

"Dan is one of those rare individuals who embodies the true spirit of tzedakah," said Karen Mock, president of Canadian Friends of Haifa University. "When I first joined the board of CFHU, I was immediately impressed by his modesty, sincerity and commitment to human rights and peace initiatives, backed by an overwhelming generosity but with a desire to remain behind the scenes in order to empower others to succeed."

Dan said he's "extremely proud" of the university. "Anyone in North America or in the Diaspora who might have a tendency to be critical of Israel should really look at this university as a special case separate and on its own, because what goes on there is truly amazing. The standard of integration among the different communities [20 per cent of the student body is Arab] is a model for coexistence that the rest of the country should follow. This is an institution that does not get enough recognition."

He said the peace and conflict management studies program will be open to Israeli and international students at the master's level. "It will offer a multi-disciplinary approach to peace and conflict resolution and the graduates will most likely go on to work in either government or non-government organizations as professionally trained peace negotiators. They will have superb qualifications when they finish this program."

His wife, Amira, first exposed Dan to the University of Haifa, he said. To celebrate his union, Dan gave his bride the gift of an endowment fund in her name that provides doctoral fellowships for underprivileged students at the school.

Dan comes from a background of neurosurgery, medical research and biotechnology, having earned a medical degree from the University of Toronto and a PhD from McGill University.

After five years as an assistant professor of neurosurgery at Louisiana State University's school of medicine in New Orleans, Dan left the field to become the CEO of Novopharm Biotech, a drug research firm. He's currently president of Regulus Investments and a trustee of the Paloma Foundation, an organization that assists charities in providing services for women's and children's health.

Dan is also president of Gemini Power Corp., a renewable energy company, and is currently working with Canada's First Nations to develop hydroelectric power and other sustainable energy projects.

The Nov. 15 event will feature a performance by Noa and Mira, a renowned Israeli Arab and Jewish singing duo whose music focuses on what Jews and Arabs can strive for if they choose dialogue over violence.

SHUL HONOURS LEBOVICS: Earlier this month, philanthropists Joe and Wolf Lebovic received Beth Sholom Synagogue's 58th annual Humanitarian Award for their "singular passion to give back to their community." PROTECT YOURSELF FROM THE H1N1 FLU VIRUS

The H1N1 flu virus is different from regular seasonal flu. This is a new strain of influenza and humans have little to no natural immunity to it. The H1N1 flu virus has spread quickly around the world and in June 2009, the World Health Organization declared it a pandemic.

Plan ahead

- Learn how to recognize the flu symptoms and when you need to see a health care provider.
- Get the H1N1 flu vaccine when it becomes available.
- Speak to your family and friends about how you can help each other during the flu season.
- Stock up on essentials such as pain and fever medications, and easy meals.
- Have important phone numbers, such as your doctor's or pharmacist's, on hand.

PROTÉGEZ-VOUS CONTRE LE VIRUS DE LA GRIPPE H1N1

Le virus de la grippe H1N1 est différent du virus ordinaire de la grippe saisonnière. C'est une nouvelle souche de grippe contre laquelle les humains ne sont pas naturellement immunisés. Le virus de la grippe H1N1 s'est propagé rapidement partout dans le monde et, en juin 2009, l'Organisation mondiale de la Santé a déclaré que cette grippe était passée au stade de pandémie.

Planifiez à l'avance

- Sachez reconnaître les symptômes de la grippe et déterminer lorsqu'il est temps de consulter un professionnel de la santé.
- Faites-vous vacciner contre la grippe H1N1 lorsque le vaccin sera disponible.
- Parlez avec votre famille et vos amis de la façon dont vous pouvez vous entraider pendant la saison de la grippe.
- Faites des réserves de produits essentiels comme des médicaments contre la douleur et la fièvre et des repas simples.
- Ayez les numéros de téléphone importants, comme celui de votre médecin ou pharmacien, à portée de main.

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — In light of the recession, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg has taken cost-cutting measures to ensure that it can weather any potential decline in future donations.

"While our CJA campaign this past year reached the same amount as the year before, we didn't meet our targeted goal, which was higher than last year," said federation CEO Bob Freedman.

"Given the economic recession, I made a decision to freeze all salaries and cut out travel for this year for federation employees. The federation won't be sending anyone to the [Jewish Federations of North America] General Assembly in Washington this year as a result of the cuts."

Brenda Tessler-Donen, director of B'nai Brith Camp, said that although the federation's allotment to the camp went up "a little bit" in 2009, overall, the camp received "about 15 per cent less funds from grant applications to different funding bodies than the year before."

Tessler-Donen added, "Certain funding bodies that we regularly apply to had less to distribute. One application we made was to the [Massachusetts-based] Harold Grinspoon Foundation, which gives out money for Jewish camping. This looked very promising initially, but our application was rejected, since that body had been affected by the Madoff [Ponzi] affair."

Francis Barett, managing director of the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada, said that her organization is "definitely feeling the effects of the recession.

"Although our federation allocation wasn't decreased last year, I anticipate we will get less this year. The major fundraiser, the Sol Kanee Lecture, which we had last spring, was down. Most people gave half of what they gave the year before, meaning we were down about $30,000, which is about 10 per cent of our budget."

Emily Shane, executive director of Jewish Child and Family Services, said her agency is also feeling the effects of the downturn.

> Salaries frozen, allocations to agencies down this year

"Although our allotment from the federation stayed the same this past year, the price for us to deliver our services went up," she said, adding that there have been fewer donations to the food bank that the agency runs.

"For the first time ever, we sent staff to buy food to fill the pantry, because not enough donors donated it. We also give out food cards, and the amounts have gone up dramatically," Shane said. "I worry that the money coming in from donors could decrease in the coming year, while our clients' needs are increasing… The immigration and resettlement grant we received from the government also went down a bit."

Rory Paul, CEO of the Gray Academy of Jewish Education, says that, luckily, so far the Hebrew day school hasn't experienced any real effects of the economic recession.

"We actually have 11 more students this year than last year, and our allocation from the federation remained the same. That is the case, even though we have fewer new immigrant families, which means that more Winnipeg families chose to go to our school than previously," Paul said.

"But my gut is that in Manitoba we may not have felt he full effects of the recession, so we'll have to see if families are feeling the effects of less disposable income and whether that will affect us next year."

Gayle Waxman, executive director of the Rose & Max Rady Jewish Community Centre, said that "thankfully, we have not been hit by the recession."

She attributed this to renovations to the facility last year.

"We expected our membership to go up after the renovations, and it has. We are in growth mode. Our allocation from the federation wasn't decreased, and we got a one-time grant of $20,000 last year from the federation to offset costs associated with the renovation," she added.

New team organizing dances for immigrants

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — When people learned that Canada Sheli was a business rather than a non-profit organization, they stopped supporting its programs and dances for Israeli immigrants, according to community organizers and Yossi Perlman, who now runs rival dances.

Until last spring, Canada Sheli, founded by Ron East in 2006, had been arranging programs that were co-sponsored by Jewish organizations that thought Canada Sheli was a non-profit group.

Bob Freedman, CEO of the Jewish Federation, and Gayle Waxman, executive director of the Rady JCC, both told The CJN last spring that they had always "assumed" that Canada Sheli was a non-profit organization, which was why they had agreed to co-sponsor events with them.

However, Ron East told The CJN at the time that Canada Sheli was not registered as a charitable organization and was "not a non-profit organization." He indicated that Canada Sheli had always been registered as a business name by Shirli Vilenski East, his wife.

Canada Sheli also used to put on dance parties for Russian Israeli immigrants, but it ceased doing so last spring, after Perlman, a new immigrant from Israel, began putting on rival dances.

The community learned that Canada Sheli was a business and lost faith in the group after it put on a dance party, under the name EOR Productions, last Passover, featuring a "Magic Show plus Sex Toys 101," with "games, prizes, display, education and more, courtesy of It's My Pleasure," a store that sponsored the dance.

The dance with sex toys was also sponsored by Desserts Plus, a store that carries kosher Israeli food products.

When contacted by The CJN, Barbara Reiss of Desserts Plus said she knew nothing about the dance having sex toys. "Needless to say, if I had been told about that by Ron [East] I would not have sponsored this dance," she said.

East had teamed up with Michael Cantor, a new Russian Israeli immigrant, to put on the dances under the name EOR Productions, whose website said it was "a division of Canada Sheli."

EOR no longer puts on dances, Perlman said in an interview. "The last one they had was last May 2009, but ever since the Jewish community learned of their party with sex toys, I don't think people wanted to sponsor their dances," he said.

Perlman decided to put on the rival dance parties after learning that East and Cantor were doing this for profit. Until then, Perlman had been a Canada Sheli volunteer with East and Cantor at two previous dance parties.

He said he wanted to become a business partner with East and Cantor when he realized they were running their dances as a business, not as volunteers. When this didn't materialize, Perlman decided to compete with them in organizing parties catering to Russian Israelis.

He teamed up with Sofia Barklon, who immigrated to the city in 1990, to put on rival dances, and has continued to have these parties once a month.

He noted that he and Barklon had "made a little profit" with their last party, enough that they intended to carry on with their monthly dances.

"We have been getting sponsorship from different businesses and members of the Jewish community. We had about 160 people to our last dance, which had both new immigrants and other Jewish Winnipeggers."

There are now over 2,000 adult Russian Israeli immigrants in the city.

Canada Sheli used to put out a regular monthy online newsletter sent to an e-mail list of about 1,000 members of the Jewish community, mostly new immigrants. Since Canada Sheli stopped doing this, no one else in the Jewish community has taken on the project. It also used to organize Israeli movie nights.

Others, such as the Rady Jewish Community Centre, are now putting on programs designed to appeal to the Israeli immigrant population.

Critics bash Israel, despite Goldstone's doubts

According to Reports

By Paul Michaels

The controversial Goldstone report, released in mid-September, remains a hot news topic. Written under a mandate crafted by the notorious UN Human Rights Council (UNHRC), it principally accused Israel of war crimes – of deliberately targeting and killing unarmed Palestinian civilians during the war in Gaza last winter.

In "Goldstone: 'If This Was a Court of Law, There Would Have Been Nothing Proven,'" (Forward.com, Oct. 7), Gal Beckerman spoke to the report's author in an interview that held some surprising admissions.

Beckerman pointed out that Goldstone's allegations against Israel were "built mostly on testimony of Palestinian eyewitnesses, which have received little scrutiny or verification." Indeed, Beckerman revealed that Goldstone not only acknowledged the tentative nature of his findings, he admitted that the evidence he weighed would not have met the burden of proof in a courtroom – the article's headline is a direct quote from Goldstone.

Critics have raised similar concerns about the report's evidence and methodology. For instance, in "Deep Denial" (National Post, Oct. 14), Israel's ambassador to the United States, Michael Oren, wrote: "The [Goldstone] judges interviewed hand-picked Hamas witnesses, several of them senior commanders disguised as civilians, and uncritically accepted their testimony."

More recently, Goldstone expressed another reservation. As reported by the National Post's Steve Edwards, ("UN Report accuses Israel of war crimes," Oct. 17), Goldstone criticized the UNHRC's Oct. 16 decision endorsing his report and referring it to UN headquarters in New York for singling out Israel without mentioning any wrongoing by Hamas. "'This draft resolution saddens me, as it includes only allegations against Israel,' he was quoted as saying in Swiss newspaper Le Temps…'There is not a single phrase condemning Hamas as we have done in the report. I hope that the council can modify the text.'"

Such statements prompted critics to charge that Goldstone was hopelessly naive to believe that the UNHRC – a body that has singled out Israel for more condemnatory resolutions than all other countries in the world combined – would respect his own concern for a semblance of "balance" in a report that was nevertheless deeply flawed to begin with. (After all, the initial mandate from the UNHRC was to investigate only Israeli "violations…against the Palestinian people.")

While Goldstone is having second thoughts about important aspects of his report and his involvement with the UNHRC, others are apparently only too pleased to have another stick with which to beat Israel.

Toronto Star columnist Haroon Siddiqui can claim credit for standing foremost in this crowd. In a series of columns beginning in September, Siddiqui took the allegations in the Goldstone report at face value – but he went even further.

In "Shining a Light on Israeli Aggression in Gaza" (Toronto Star, Sept. 21), Siddiqui wrote that the report "is a condemnation not only of Israel but also of its apologists in Canada, including the media" who have buried it "under an orchestrated avalanche of negative reaction."

Siddiqui claimed that "Israel and its defenders" have mounted a "smear campaign" against Goldstone and the UNHRC. He thus determinedly ignored the glaring fact that the UNHRC, led by some of the world's most anti-democratic, human rights-abusing countries whose primary mission is to isolate and delegitimize Israel, is a farce. And into this farce stepped a respected judge.

This column previously critiqued a Siddiqui piece ("Israel keeps shooting the messenger," Toronto Star, Sept. 27), in which he described Richard Falk as "another high-profile Jewish public intellectual." By portraying Falk as a fair-minded critic of Israeli policies, Siddiqui ignored the fact that Falk is actually an anti-Israel fanatic who has compared Israelis to Nazis.

In "Nobel Prize puts pressure on Obama and Israel" (Toronto Star, Oct. 11) Siddiqui – without presenting any evidence – claimed that the Goldstone report "has divided the Jewish community, with many moving away from ethnic/religious/national solidarity toward fidelity with human rights, international law, truth and justice." Siddiqui's cartoonish dichotomy is absurd. If it wasn't such a profound insult to the Jewish community, it would be laughable.

Given Siddiqui's penchant for following the UNHRC's obsessive Israel-bashing, his talk of "truth and justice" is nothing less than perverse.

Kingston shul kicks off its centenary year

By JORDAN PRESS
Special to The CJN

KINGSTON, Ont. — In a city that prides itself on its history, Kingston's small Jewish community is marking a momentous occasion in its own history.

On Oct. 10, as members of Beth Israel Synagogue celebrated Simchat Torah, the congregation marked the beginning of its centenary, a year-long celebration of Jewish life in Kingston.

As celebrations kick off, the shul – which describes itself as "a welcoming contemporary Orthodox congregation" – hopes to connect with past members and users of the synagogue to bring them back to Kingston, which has an estimated 900 Jews, and take part in the 100-year anniversary.

The organizing committee is trying to reach past members and synagogue visitors whose addresses Beth Israel doesn't have on record. After 100 years of existence, there are a lot of people who have come through as members, residents or students.

"Anyone who used Betlf Israel… we're inviting them to the homecoming," said organizing committee co-chair Gini Rosen.

She said her committee is trying to ensure that the shul commemorates its past, celebrates its present and solidifies its future.

"We're doing that," Rosen said. "We're trying to invest money in the [Beth Israel] trust fund… for the future so we can guarantee we will have a future."

The Jewish community in Kingston can trace its roots back to the mid-1800s, but it would take more than half a century before a congregation formed.

It was on Oct. 10, 1910, that members of Kingston's Jewish community laid the cornerstone for the first Beth Israel synagogue building.

For many years, the congregation was housed along Queen Street in Kingston's downtown. Today, the synagogue resides on Centre Street in one of the oldest residential sections of Kingston, near Queen's University and the Lake Ontario waterfront.

"There are so few small Jewish congregations that are vibrant and growing," Rosen said. "We're an anomaly."

(The city also has a Reform congregation, Congregation Iyr HaMelech, which was formed in 1975.)

A committee of Beth Israel congregants has worked for more than a year to organize the events surrounding the shul's centenary. The celebrations will peak on the weekend of May 14, when Beth Israel holds a homecoming for anyone who has ever walked through the front doors of the synagogue.

The committee sent out notices to approximately 500 past and present members to urge them to save the May date and make the trek to Kingston to take part in the celebrations. Official invitations for the homecoming weekend will go out in January.

The event will include a traditional Friday night dinner with guest rabbis and cantors, Shabbat services followed by historic walking tours of the city and a gala reception in the evening, and a special concert at Grant Hall on the Queen's campus entitled "100 Years of Jewish Music."

The congregation is also planning to fundraise throughout the year and make a donation to the city to mark the anniversary.

Ottawa cemetery vandalized

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — One of the capital's two Jewish cemeteries was desecrated last week with swastikas and anti-Semitic slogans.

Last Thursday morning, Oct. 22, police were contacted by neighbours who noticed a defaced sign at the gate to Jewish Memorial Gardens, located south of the city in the village of Herbert Corners. Some time during the previous night, eight headstones were defaced as well.

The vandalism is being investigated as a hate crime by the Ottawa police hate crimes unit.

"It is extremely disturbing to see such a determined act of hatred, and we are hopeful that this will outrage not only the victims of the hate, but the entire community of Ottawa," said Mitchell Bellman, president of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa.

"This was not just random vandalism. It is pretty nasty stuff."

Swastikas, as well as the words "kike" and "F--k the Jews" were scrawled on headstones and the cemetery sign. In addition, Bellman said that stones had been kicked in a pattern that, if viewed from above, would look like a swastika.

"This attack on a defenceless cemetery reaches deep into the psyche of the entire Jewish community. Anti-Semitism is an ongoing problem right here in Canada, whether we want to admit that or not," B'nai Brith Canada spokesperson Frank Dimant said in a statement.

Bellman said extra security has been discussed with police, but is difficult because of the cemetery's remote location.

"It is an isolated cemetery in the country, in the middle of a farmer's field, and there is a limit to what can be done to protect it," he said.

Butch Zinman, chairperson of the agency that oversees both of Ottawa's Jewish cemeteries, said monument suppliers and the cemetery's landscape contractor pitched in immediately to help remove the graffiti, bringing chemicals and a pressure washer.

Staff at what is known as the "new Jewish cemetery" told CBC News that this was the first time the graveyard has been vandalized this way.

Ottawa's older Jewish cemetery on Bank Street was vandalized twice in 2007.

Calls to police weren't returned as of The CJN's deadline.

BGU students study intl. marketing at U of M

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Eleven Israeli students were here for over two weeks in October taking a course in international marketing at the University of Manitoba's Asper School of Business.

The students from the Guilford Glazer School of Business and Management of the Ben-Gurion University of the Negev (BGU) were here as part of a joint exchange program between the University of Manitoba (U of M) and BGU that was made possible through the philanthropy of Gerald Schwartz.

This is the first time BGU students have come to the city as part of the program. They came with Gil Glaser, the public relations director for the Glazer business school.

"U of M has already sent two missions of students to study in English at our university in Be'er Sheva, and this is our first reciprocal visit," Glaser said. "We hope to continue doing this on an annual basis. We are happy to host Manitoban students, as it's a good way for a lot of non-Jewish students to experience Israel, fall in love with the country and become good ambassadors for Israel. In addition to studying, students also get to tour the country."

Tomer Poran, 24, who is completing his BA in management and finance at BGU said, "Everything about the program in Winnipeg, both academically and socially has been very positive. The instructor here has been very good, and I have learned more than I expected I could in such a short time... My goal is to complete my masters in the United States, or possibly Canada, and then return to live in Israel."

This is the first visit to Canada for Roni Mikel, 26, who is completing her BA in politics and management at the Glazer school.

"It has been amazing," Mikel said. "The Jewish community here has been warm and welcoming. We had a Shabbat dinner together and then went to Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, where I had an aliyah to the Torah – my first time ever. We were also taken to a hockey game... I intend to live in Israel, but I would like to check into options for getting my master's degree in Manitoba," she said.

Shimrit Hazan, 27, is completing her BA in hotel and tourism management at Glazer. She told The CJN that "grades, fluency in English and a person's character" were factors considered in the choice of students who would go to Canada on the exchange.

"I have been to Canada before, but never to Winnipeg. It's unique. It's quiet, and the people here are warm and very nice."

Glaser, a retired naval officer, said that while the group is in Winnipeg, "we see ourselves as ambassadors for Israel.

"I have been to other places in the world such as France, Germany and Austria, where when I say I'm from Israel, the response isn't positive... Here, everyone has been positive on hearing we're from Israel, from the stewardess on the plane to the hostess at the restaurant last night."

Glaser noted that BGU offers a unique honours MBA program in English, "modelled on first-rate American schools." It concentrates four 12-week semesters into 13 months of study.

"The program is designed for outstanding Israeli and foreign students with top management potential. It is implemented in co-operation with senior faculty members at Columbia University's business school in New York," he said.

Obituary

Rabbi touched thousands of people

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Several hundred people recently packed the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue to bid a final farewell to Rabbi Louis Berkal, Winnipeg's longest-serving rabbi, who died on Oct. 20 at the age of 95.

In his eulogy, Rabbi Alan Green, the synagogue's senior rabbi, said that Rabbi Berkal fit all the criteria for the ideal rabbi and Torah scholar. In his 50-year tenure at the Shaarey Zedek, he brought to his calling understanding and strength, modesty and patience.

"You wonder where he found the strength and reserve to serve for 50 years," Rabbi Green said at the service last Thursday. "On average, a modern rabbi only stays in a pulpit for about five years.

"Rabbi Berkal was the voice of the Shaarey Zedek for half a century. While other rabbis and cantors, executive directors and presidents came and went, he was the one constant. He officiated at thousands of b'nai mitzvot, weddings and funerals. He touched many thousands of people in his career."

Rabbi Berkal was born in Lithuania in 1914. He came to Canada with his family while still a teenager. His first posting after receiving his ordination was in Grand Forks in North Dakota, where he served from 1939 to 1954.

In Grand Forks, he met Sara, his wife-to-be. They were married just short of 70 years. (Sara Berkal died in March.)

In 1954, he was invited to join the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue as both rabbi and cantor. While the synagogue for most of that time had two rabbis and, in later years, two cantors, Rabbi Berkal served as the sole rabbi of more than 1,000 families for different periods while the synagogue was searching for another rabbi.

Rabbi Berkal's dedication to his congregation is captured in two stories that Rabbi Green told at the funeral. He told of one warm summer Sunday when the Berkals had family visiting from out of town and were getting ready to head to the beach. Just before they were scheduled to leave, Rabbi Berkal received a call from a congregant pleading with the rabbi to visit the caller's dying father in the hospital. Rabbi Berkal told his wife to go without him while he went to the hospital. He would come to the beach later.

Then there was the Yom Kippur service he led while he was in his early 80s. The principal cantor at that time had to be with his wife who had just given birth. Rabbi Berkal answered the call to duty and filled in despite his years.

With his health deteriorating, he was forced to retire five years ago. At that time, the synagogue held a special evening in his honour.

"Rabbi Berkal was a product of that prewar eastern European culture that doesn't exist any more," Rabbi Green said. "He always looked for the good in life. He was the most optimistic person I have ever known. His passing is truly the end of an era."

Before the funeral service, the rabbi's violin teacher played some melodies. The service also included a song by the Shaarey Zedek choir. It concluded with the late Rabbi Berkal's own moving recording of a tribute to zaidas.

Rabbi Berkal is survived by his children, Harriet, Ben and Harvey in Winnipeg and Dr. Alan Berkal of Toronto, and their families.

Student leaders gather for leadership retreat

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Earlier this month, about 70 Jewish student leaders from coast to coast gathered in Guelph, Ont., for the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students' annual leadership retreat.

CFJS, which was founded in 2004 to empower Canadian Jewish students, invited presidents of Hillels and other Jewish campus groups as well as "up-and-coming" Jewish leaders to take part in sessions and seminars focused on pluralism, inclusiveness, Israel advocacy and effective media communication.

Jackie Brown, 19, a first-year McMaster University student in the arts and science program, was one of the up-and-coming Jewish leaders who attended the conference from Oct. 16 to 18.

Jackie Brown, right, with Talia Salzman at the CFJS retreat in Guelph earlier this month.

Brown, a first-year representative for Israel on Campus at McMaster, a student group that advocates for Israel by focusing on its achievements and its commitment to peace, said she was motivated to become involved in the Jewish student community after taking part in a nine-month volunteer program in Israel last year.

While there, Brown volunteered for three months with Magen David Adom, Israel's ambulance service. She spent another three months teaching English at an elementary school, and spent the last third of her program taking courses and travelling throughout the country.

"After the amazing experiences I had, I knew I wanted to get involved when I came to McMaster," she said.

Brown, who was encouraged by the president of Israel on Campus at her school to take part in the CFJS retreat, said that the "great atmosphere" throughout the weekend reinforced her to desire to be part of the Jewish campus community.

"Something I had always thought about that was reiterated at the conference was how important it is to reach out to everyone on campus – Jews and non-Jews – and to hold events for everyone. It really promotes a tolerant and inclusive atmosphere," said Brown, who is originally from Toronto.

She added that there was also an emphasis on the importance of portraying the non-military aspects of Israel.

"Most people only hear about that, but having spent so much time in Israel, I can really attest to the amazing culture and people and all the exciting things about Israel."

The sessions, some led by leaders from organizations such as the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), focused on ways to respond to anti-Semitism and anti-Israel sentiments on campus, how to cater to as many students as possible when planning events and how to be more inclusive.

"We talked about different programming ideas and the use of social media such as Facebook and Twitter in Israel advocacy," Brown said.

Eyal Kraut, a 20-year-old, third-year science student at the University of Manitoba, would be considered one of the veteran leaders at the Guelph retreat.

Kraut, who was born and raised in Winnipeg and serves as Winnipeg's Jewish Students' Association (JSA) president, said the retreat gave students from across the country an opportunity to network and learn from each other.

"There was also a forum to allow us to see where the [National Committee for Jewish Campus Life, CIJA's campus organization] is headed with its initiatives and everyone was there to discuss what we can do through our organizations," Kraut said.

He said he was particularly impressed with an initiative that's in the works to develop a website that will help Jewish student leaders share their experiences with Israel advocacy programs that worked on their campuses.

Kraut said that as a JSA leader, he enjoys attending Jewish student conferences because it's a great way to connect and network with his peers.

"I really felt like we were part of one big Jewish community. Canada is a huge country, but at this conference, I really felt like the Jewish community in Canada is tight knit. We all know each other, people from different cities, and we all have mutual friends."

He said that although he has ambitions to pursue a career in medicine, he hopes that there will always be a place for him in Jewish community leadership circles as a volunteer.

"I went to a Jewish high school in Winnipeg and I was pretty involved there, and I'm involved at the university level, so I can definitely see myself being involved in the community as an adult."

Brown, on the other hand, said the idea that she could pursue a career in Jewish leadership wasn't something she thought about before, but the retreat influenced her to think seriously about it.

"I really love doing this and I really love being involved in the Jewish community, so it is a possibility."

Singer honoured to provide Holocaust education through her medium – opera

By RIVA GOLD
Special to The CJN

Melanie Gall, a 27-year-old soprano from Edmonton, is performing in an opera about how a girl survived the Holocaust by living in a pit with a rat.

In Hebrew with English subtitles, And the Rat Laughed will be staged at the Richmond Hill Centre for the Performing Arts on Nov. 5 and 7 at 8 p.m. and Nov. 8 at 2 p.m.

Although this opera may be new to Canadians, it received critical acclaim during its Israeli run.

Gall plays the role of Lima Energelly, an anthropologist from the year 2099, who uncovers the story in memories.

Throughout the show, Lima is largely an observer, struggling to uncover the myth about a girl who survived the Holocaust by living in a pit with a rat.

"The show delivers the message that one must never forget what has happened," says Gall (whose father is CJN columnist Gerald Gall).

"It is easy for a tragic event to fade into myth as time passes, and with the Holocaust, this must never happen."

Gall is passionate about passing on this important message through the medium of song and script. She says music has the special power to capture the attention of audiences everywhere, regardless of religion or culture.

"The most rewarding aspect for me is the opportunity to educate audiences about the Holocaust – to help ensure that such a monumentally tragic event is never forgotten. To be able to do this through my medium – opera music – is a great honour."

And the Rat Laughed will run during Holocaust Education Week, Nov. 1 to 11, which features more than 160 educational and cultural programs devoted to Holocaust education. The show tells a multi-generational story designed to promote Holocaust remembrance and understanding. Along with Gall, the cast includes Israeli soprano Einat Aronstein, Andrew Tees and Adriana Albu.

The opera is produced by Opera York in partnership with the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. The story is based on a novel by Nava Samel, an Israeli writer who received the Tel Aviv Woman of the Year in Literature Award in 2007.

The score was composed by Samel's fellow award-winner, Ella Milch-Sheriff from Haifa, who received the prestigious Prime Minister's Prize for Israeli Composers for this opera in 2005.

Gall said she hopes to introduce a new generation of listeners to what she calls "the fascinating world of classical music."

For her, the music in the show is both modern and extremely accessible to listeners. Gall has herself undertaken extensive musical training.

After completing a music degree at the University of Alberta in 1999, she studied voice at the University of Western Ontario, then at the Glenn Gould School of Music in Toronto. In 2008, she graduated from the Manhattan School of Music with a post-graduate degree in opera performance.

Over the years, Gall successfully released a CD in Hebrew called Min HaLev and a French album called La Nuit En Rose. Her performances have also earned her numerous awards over the years, including the Ben Steinberg Musical Legacy Award, which she won in 2008.

For the New York-based professional singer, starring in operas is becoming an old habit. She has performed in shows around the world and in recitals in Italy, Zimbabwe, Argentina and Barbados.

"I was singing at an opera festival in Mississippi when I found out I got the part," Gall says. "Everyone there was very, very excited for me – they had never heard of a Hebrew opera. This is a first for me."

Though the musical is in Hebrew, Gall is still working on learning the language.

"I learned enough Hebrew to get through my bat mitzvah, then promptly forgot it all," she jokes. "I had to re-learn Hebrew in Israel."

After high school, Gall spent two summers in Israel, where she worked on Kibbutz Kalia by the Dead Sea and sang at the International Vocal Arts Festival.

"My Hebrew really improved there," she says. "I'm certainly not fluent, but I have an extensive vocabulary now, and I'm always learning."

In addition to her singing career, Gall is a music teacher and a published author. Her first book, co-written with her sister, Wendy, came out in 2007.

Europe: A Savvy Girl's Guide offers practical advice and comic sketches for young travellers about to go overseas.

"I have so much drama wherever I travel," Gall says, citing lost passports, rescheduled flights and bartering disasters.

"Luckily, travel skills come from trial and error."

Gall says she wrote the book in an accessible "chick-lit" style for world and armchair travellers alike.

But when it comes to being a performer, Gall's advice is simple: stay positive and perform as much as possible.

While it's important to have a teacher who can provide valuable vocal and career advice, she stresses the value of independent research.

"Learn as much as possible," she says. "Don't depend on your coach or teacher to tell you what the song you are singing is about."

Ultimately, she notes that although a career as a classical vocalist isn't easy, "it can certainly include a lot of fun."

Gall said she hopes to introduce a new generation of listeners to what she calls "the fascinating world of classical music."

Canada will 'stand beside Israel', Cannon

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Two Canadian parliamentarians attended Israeli President Shimon Peres' second annual "Facing Tomorrow" presidential conference in Jerusalem last week.

Foreign Minister Lawrence Cannon and Liberal MP Irwin Cotler both took part in the three-day event, which concluded Oct. 22. It examined ways of creating a better future for Israel, Jews and the rest of the world.

While Cannon didn't address the conference formally, he did meet with Peres to conduct a "work meeting," according to a statement released by Peres' office.

During the meeting, Cannon assured Peres that Canada will continue to "stand beside Israel – particularly against the threat of terrorism and comments that deny the Jewish State or the Jewish People. These are things that are foreign to Canadian values, and to Canada itself," the statement said.

Cannon also mentioned that Canada is "very interested" in helping advance the peace process between Israelis and Palestinians. He said he would "present" Prime Minister Stephen Harper with "a plan for the renewal of the multilateral refugee committee under Canadian auspices as put forward by the Madrid convention."

Peres thanked Cannon for his comments and said that in this regard, "Canada can contribute to the peace process and assist with one of the central issues in the negotiations between the State of Israel and the Palestinian people."

Meanwhile, in his main address to the conference, Cotler told The CJN he focused on "state-sanctioned cultures of incitement" and on the lack of international due process given specifically to Israel by the United Nations.

Cotler cited numerous examples of how the UN has "turned international law on its head" regarding Israel.

The UN Human Rights Council (UNHRC) should be understood as a body that is "obsessively" focused with singling out Israel in every meeting it holds, as evidenced by the Jewish state being a "permanent agenda item" at all its meetings, he told the conference.

"There's not been one [UNHRC] resolution against Iran or Sudan. Not one."

Cotler also slammed the UNHRC's recent Goldstone Report on last winter's Gaza war as a document that "aids and abets the lack of due process on Israel," and in a further dig at the UNHRC, said the resolution that created the Goldstone inquiry was conceived as a "star chamber" indictment.

Last year's conference managed to attract many high-profile world leaders and dozens of former high-ranking dignitaries, including then-U.S. president George W. Bush, Henry Kissinger, Mikhail Gorbachev and Joschka Fischer. The 2008 panels addressing economic issues also boasted some big names, including Google co-founder Sergey Brin and media mogul Rupert Murdoch.

This year, however, the conference made do with lesser known guests, such as Macedonian President Gjorge Ivanov and Polish Foreign Minister Radoslaw Sikorski. Other participants included Susan Rice, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations; Josh Silverman, global president of Skype, and Jimmy Wales, founder of Wikipedia.

Organizers said Peres wanted this year's summit to put more emphasis on economics rather than politics.

Hamas: War will settle Jerusalem dispute, not talks

By JACK KHOURY
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Temple Mount opened to worshippers and tourists a day after violent rioting at the site.

Some eight police officers were injured Sunday morning during the attacks, which began shortly after the mosques on the mount opened for prayers. A second round of rioting began later in the morning.

Officers stormed the mount carrying glass shields for protection, but did not enter the mosques. About 100 rioters holed up in the Al-Aksa Mosque for much of Sunday.

At least 21 Arab rioters were arrested in connection with the violence.

Following the attacks, police closed the Temple Mount to Muslim worshippers and to tourists. Prayers continued at the Western Wall, where police presence was increased.

The violence came after repeated calls Saturday by Muslim leaders appealing to Arabs to come protect Jerusalem and the Temple Mount from "Jewish conquest." Police had announced Saturday that they would increase police forces and patrols in the area based on the Muslim incitement.

Rumours circulated throughout the Palestinian and Muslim community that Jews had planned to take over the site, which is holy to Jews and Muslims. The rumours have proven to be unfounded.

The violence also spread to eastern Jerusalem, including the neighbourhood of Ras al-Amud, where masked Palestinians threw stones and other objects at Israeli security forces.

At a conference Sunday night, prominent religious rabbis and politicians decried what they called "discrimination" against religious Jews who are made to wait for long periods of time in order to ascend the Temple Mount. They called on Jews to increase their visits to the site.

On Sunday, Hamas political leader Khaled Meshal declared that "Jerusalem's fate will be decided with jihad (holy war) and resistance, and not negotiations."

Speaking from Damascus where he lives, Meshal voiced hope that Israel's Arabs and the residents of the West Bank would join the residents of the Gaza Strip, which is ruled by Hamas, in staging demonstrations in protest of the Jerusalem events, Israel Radio reported.

An Israeli Arab lawmaker warned earlier Sunday that Israel was "provoking" the Muslim world by cracking down on Arab rioters on the Temple Mount.

"Israel is provoking a billion Muslims around the world, who will not hesitate to protect the Temple Mount with their own bodies," said MK Talab Al-Sana.

Meanwhile, Police Commissioner David Cohen arrived at the scene to witness the riots. He said the leaders responsible for the incitement were on location, provoking the rioters.

"There are large groups of East Jerusalem Arabs there who are being encouraged by the Islamic Movement leaders," said the commissioner. "The police will forcefully clamp down on those responsible for disrupting the peace at the Temple Mount."

Cohen added that Israel's policy is to keep the Temple Mount open to both Jewish and Muslim visitors "today and on every other day."

Israel retaliates in Gaza

The Air Force bombed a building and two smuggling tunnels in Gaza. The raid last Wednesday was in response to a Qassam rocket attack near a kibbutz in the western Negev several hours earlier. The building located in Gaza City was used to produce weapons, according to the Israel Defence Forces. Some 55 rockets and mortar shells have been launched at Israel in the past three months, the IDF said. More than 250 rockets have targeted Israel since the end of Operation Cast Lead in January.

Ban warns of Hezbollah

The continued presence of Hezbollah and Palestinian militants in Lebanon poses a serious threat to the government in Beirut and to regional stability, United Nations Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon warned in his recently released six-month report. Ban demanded in his report the implementation of UN Resolution 1559, which calls for the disbanding of all militias, and called for the militant groups to be disarmed. "The existence and activities of Lebanese and non-Lebanese militias continue to pose a threat to the stability of the country," Ban said. The presence of weapons in the country outside government control and the continued existence of militias contribute to tensions and insecurity in Lebanon and beyond, and could eventually lead to the resumption of hostilities unless immediately addressed," he warned.

Did Israeli and Iranian talk?

Israeli and Iranian nuclear officials participated together in a nuclear non-proliferation conference last month in Cairo, according to the Israel Atomic Energy Commission. The representatives sat at the table during the regional dialogue but did not have any real "dialogue or interaction," a commission spokesperson said. Iran denied the report, which broke in an Australian newspaper last week and became widespread after Ha'aretz reported on it, stressing that the sides did not meet privately. The meeting reportedly took place Sept. 29 and 30. Other participants reportedly attending were representatives of the Arab League, Jordan, Egypt, Tunisia, Turkey, Morocco, the United Arab Emirates and Saudi Arabia, as well as European and American officials. It was held under the auspices of the International Commission on Nuclear Non-Proliferation and Disarmament, an unofficial forum established by the Australian and Japanese governments. During one of the meetings, the Iranian representative asked the Israeli representative, "Do you or do you not have nuclear weapons?" Ha'aretz reported, citing unnamed meeting participants. The Israeli envoy did not answer.

Family murdered

The Israeli family murdered in their Rishon LeZion home were likely stabbed to death by a professional killer, according to an autopsy. Israelis reacted with horror last week to the murder of six members of the Oshrenko family. Among the three generations of victims found stabbed to death Saturday in their burning home were a three-year-old girl and four-month-old boy. The autopsy also showed that the father of the children wrestled with the killer, Ha'aretz reported. The members of the Oshrenko family killed were Revital, 3, and Netanel, 4 months; their parents, Tatiana, 28, and Dimitry, 32; and grandparents Edward and Ludmilla, both 56. Tatiana and Dimitry, Russian émigrés, operated clubs and a restaurant for Russian Israelis. Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu expressed "deep pain and shock" over the murders of the family, calling the violence "horrifying" and "terrible." Firefighters were called to the apartment to put out a fire and, upon breaking down the door to the apartment, discovered the six bodies. - JTA

Panel will counter Goldstone report

But international pressure for Israel to set up an inquiry into allegations made by the Goldstone report to the effect that Israeli soldiers carried out war crimes in Gaza last winter has continued to mount.

UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon told Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman that he wants Israel to establish a commission of inquiry to investigate the incidents mentioned in the Goldstone report, a move that would obviate the need for UN institutions to continue dealing with the report.

Ban said such a probe was in Israel's interest.

Lieberman has not responded to the recommendation, but he is inclined to embrace the idea of an independent Israeli probe of the report's findings.

A statement issued by Lieberman's office after the conversation included the foreign minister's sharply worded criticism of the UN report and a demand that Ban prevent the report from being brought before the UN Security Council or the General Assembly.

Ban told Lieberman that he can't become personally involved in the matter, and that such decisions are for the UN members to make.

Government sources in Jerusalem said Lieberman has gradually come to view the creation of an independent commission of inquiry as a possible solution to the onslaught against Israel that resulted from the Goldstone report. The establishment of such a commission may prove particularly effective in blocking the report from being discussed by the Security Council or the International Criminal Court at The Hague, one of the sources said.

The Foreign Ministry has yet to formulate a clear position on the establishment of an independent commission of inquiry, but senior officials said that in light of the views being heard from the Americans and the European Union, Israel should view the idea favourably.

The prime minister's office, however, emphasized that Netanyahu won't agree to a commission of inquiry.

"The regulations for inquiries and examinations in place at the army are appropriate," sources in Netanyahu's office said.

Opposition leader Tzipi Livni, who served as foreign minister during the Gaza war, said the Goldstone report is "based on a distorted system of values."

Meanwhile, in related developments, Liberal MP and human rights advocate Irwin Cotler, who was in Israel last week to take part in the Facing Tomorrow conference hosted by Israeli President Shimon Peres, said that if Israel undertook to expand on its already "admirable" internal, fact-finding inquiries into its military operations, it could shed light on the "fraudulent" body known as the United Nations Human Rights Council (UNHRC).

In an interview with The CJN, Cotler emphasized that he did not advocate the establishment of an independent review panel, "because Goldstone asked for it."

"Israel was already doing it," Cotler said. "I'm only saying that [Israel] should enlarge what it's already doing in order for it to shine the searchlight of truth and legality on the UNHRC, not only with respect to the Goldstone mission" but all resolutions on Israel generated by the UN body.

Cotler's suggestion evoked criticism from B'nai Brith of Canada's executive vice-president Frank Dimant, who criticized similar remarks made by Cotler in an opinion piece last week in the Jerusalem Post.

"Setting up a commission of inquiry into the events in Gaza will only give credence to Goldstone's blatantly biased report. Cotler's proposal will only inadvertently put fuel into the frenzy of Israel hatred that should concern us all," Dimant said.

Cotler responded to the criticism.

"To connect what I was saying [about the] Goldstone commission… to say that I was only replying to the Goldstone commission, is to miss everything that I was saying. It actually reverses what I was saying. I wasn't saying that Israel should comply with the commission. On the contrary, Israel produced fact-finding missions before the Goldstone inquiry. The Goldstone report didn't take any of this into account."

He said his comments should not be viewed as any form of "capitulation" to the demands of an international body intent on singling out Israel for opprobrium.

Cotler said that his idea for an independent Israeli inquiry into the Gaza operation goes "far beyond" any request a report as "tainted" as Goldstone's could make. It would instead set the stage for the "unprecedented" move for Israel to turn the tables on the UNHRC.

"Israel has to move away from being characterized only as a defendant, and to start framing the narrative. The [release] of the Goldstone report now gives Israel an opportunity to anchor its narrative in truth, the evidence and the law. Otherwise, Israel's narrative is framed by the Goldstone commission," he said.

He pointed out that leading Israeli MKs and political figures are themselves currently engaged in a debate over whether to convene an independent review panel. Some of the proponents of this include Deputy Prime Minister Dan Meridor, Welfare Minister Isaac Herzog and Alan Baker, former Israeli ambassador to Canada.

Cotler revealed that in 2007, Louise Arbour, the former UN high commissioner for human rights, asked him to head an inquiry similar to that of Goldstone's.

He said Arbour asked him to lead a UN inquiry into Israel's 2006 shelling of a row of houses in the Gaza Strip town of Beit Hanoun, which killed 19 Palestinians. But he refused the offer, saying he would "not be a Jewish fig leaf" for the UN, as it had already pre-determined that Israel was guilty of human rights violations before any investigation commenced.

Cotler said it's imperative that people around the world understand that Israel is being "systematically singled out for differentiation" by the UN.

In an e-mail to Dimant, Hillel Neuer, executive director of Geneva-based Human Rights Watch, also took issue with B'nai Brith's criticism of Cotler.

While praising Dimant's "devotion to significant public and communal causes," Neuer called his comments "inappropriate," "baseless" and "irresponsible."

"Whatever policy disagreement you may have on the specific issue in question, as a community leader committed to the principles of responsibility, professionalism and respect, I hope that you will apologize for inexplicably disparaging a great Canadian, human rights advocate and champion of equal treatment for Israel," Neuer wrote.

So why does he do it? The improvement of Jerusalem is its own reward, Barkat said. "The strengthening of Jerusalem doesn't compare [in importance] to anything else in the Jewish world. A strong Jerusalem is in the best interests of every Jew in the world. It is above everything else."

This is part of the message Barkat will deliver to the Toronto Jewish community on Nov. 8, at the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada's Builders of Jerusalem gala at the Four Seasons Hotel.

The event will honour Canadians who, like Barkat, have shown exceptional dedication to nurturing the growth of Jerusalem.

"The concept of bonei Yerushalayim, building Jerusalem, isn't new. Going back 2,000 years, Jews from the Diaspora have supported the development of Jerusalem from afar," said Steve Solomon, director of the Canada Desk at the Jerusalem Foundation's headquarters in Israel.

The Jerusalem Foundation of Canada hopes the event will raise support for its 20-plus city-centre programs. "As the city centre goes, so goes the city," Solomon said. "We want to revitalize Jerusalem's city centre."

Barkat said he understands how important public-private partnership is for the city, and he has built philanthropic joint ventures into the city budget for next year.

"Joining these forces together into one big plan is very effective, adds value to both sources of capital and enables us to do things that neither of us could do alone," he said.

His attempt to maximize both municipal and philanthropic resources is one of many examples of how he brings a business approach to the political realm.

"Proposing business tools and business thinking to managing the city works," said Barkat, who made his fortune developing anti-virus software as founder of BRM in 1988, and later as an investor in several software and communication technology startups, including BackWeb and Check Point.

It was then that Barkat embarked on his philanthropic career. In 2001, he founded the social investment company Israel Venture Network, and in 2004 he founded StartUp Jerusalem, a non-profit that encourages the creation of jobs in Jerusalem through economic growth and marketing guidance.

But it was his slow-growing non-profit, Snunit – the largest Hebrew portal for web-based learning, educational information and activities – which he founded in 1994 along with the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, that eventually awakened Barkat's interest in politics.

"Through [Snunit], I got engaged in education and exposed to the public sector," he said. "Once I realized how much the city was in distress, I decided to dedicate myself fully to the public sector in Jerusalem."

That was six years ago. Barkat's first political move was the founding of the party Yerushalayim Tatzliah (Jerusalem Will Succeed) in 2003. He ran for mayor and gained 43 per cent of the vote, but ended up losing to Uri Lupoliansky. Barkat became head of the opposition on city council, a position he held until he won the election in November 2008 with 52 per cent of the vote.

The first and biggest challenge he faced when he took office was getting council members to think more professionally than politically, Barkat said.

Eventually, he managed to get the council on track, formed a coalition of 30 out of 31 members and began to bring private-sector approaches to the political process.

"Bringing business elements into play is dramatically affecting the effectiveness of the system, its focus, and its approach. We have changed the way the city is managed," he said.

He cleaned up the light-rail train mess, and the first track will be up and running by the end of 2010, Barkat said. Now, he aims to attract more business investment to the city, boost tourism and stop the migration of young adults from Jerusalem.

The most urgent of the three goals is attracting business to the city and giving it the lasting economic development it needs, he said. "When Jerusalem's economy will improve, it will create jobs, take the city out of its poverty, and it will become more attractive both to tourists and to the young migrant population."

Barkat is working with the government to create tax incentives, eliminate bottlenecks and otherwise encourage the development of Jerusalem's private sector.

Second on his list is tourism. "My vision is to dramatically increase and improve the quality of experience for tourists in the city," said Barkat, who aims to bring 10 million tourists a year to Jerusalem by 2020 (up from two million this year).

Last, but not least, Barkat is tackling the problem of young adults who come to study at the city's top post-secondary academic institutions and then leave after graduation, rather than staying in Jerusalem to build their lives there. With that in mind, he founded the non-profit organization New Spirit, which aims to deepen the connection Jerusalem students have with the city via a series of volunteer programs, cultural events and the formation of student communities.

Of course, Barkat and his plans have at times met with resistance. For instance, his attempt to boost internal tourism by opening a parking lot near Jaffa Gate on Shabbat was met with rioting by haredim, who accused Barkat of attempting to "secularize" Jerusalem.

He also encountered some resistance from the secular residents of Jerusalem neighbourhood Kiryat Yovel, who complained about the "haredization" of their environs after Barkat allowed haredi groups to open a synagogue in an abandoned building there.

Similarly, when Barkat ordered the demolition of illegal houses in Silwan, a primarily Arab neighbourhood adjacent the Old City – and, on the other hand, permitted the construction of Jewish-owned apartments in the Sheikh Jarrah neighbourhood of east Jerusalem – he was accused of holding anti-Arab views, even though about one-third of the demolition orders he issued applied to locations in west Jerusalem.

"The challenge is managing conflict, mediating things that can be mediated, and working on a common denominator as much as you can, while knowing that not everyone is necessarily going to like every decision 100 per cent," Barkat said.

"The political system in Jerusalem, for many years has been guided by zero-sum game thinking – that if I gain, somebody's got to lose. I am bringing a different kind of thinking that focuses on a win-win strategy, and people get it… There is much more acceptance and much more common ground than you might expect."

In the end, tough decisions are made according to one guiding principle: what is best for the city, Barkat said.

This is the principle he applies in response to pressure over dividing Jerusalem.

Barkat speaking to schoolchildren in Jerusalem.

"In high-tech, we had a saying: 'For every complex problem, there is one simple, wrong answer,'" he said. "Dividing Jerusalem is one such answer to one such complex problem."

Barkat said the word "Yerushalayim" comes from the Hebrew word shalem, which means "whole."

"Both ideologically and practically, Jerusalem will never be divided," he said.

There is no split city in the world that has ever worked, he said. "When you split a city, you focus on the differences. And the focus of Jerusalem has to be on the common denominator."

Further uniting east and west will entail increasing law enforcement and supervision in east Jerusalem, and investing in planning, development and infrastructure, Barkat said.

"Jerusalem will stay open and will enable freedom of religious expression, as it does today."

Jerusalem was never as open for members of all religions to practise their faiths as it has been since becoming united under Israeli sovereignty. "That is the Jerusalem that people want in the world, and that is how we are going to keep it," he said.

Barkat – a marathon runner who twice a week runs five miles from his home to his office at city hall just to "breathe in the city," and who last week announced that, as part of a fall tour of North America to raise awareness of Jerusalem as the world's top destination site for tourists and pilgrims, he'll run in the New York City Marathon – said he has loved Jerusalem since he was a child growing up next to Bakka, in Mahane Allenby.

"As a young kid, I remember playing there. It was a wonderful neighbourhood," he said.

The neighbourhood was also half a kilometre from the place where the 1967 war broke out. He was seven years old.

"I remember it very well," said Barkat, who now lives with his wife, Beverly, and their three daughters in Beit Hakerem. "It was a huge experience for me."

Barkat said his favourite place in Jerusalem is the City of David. "I go every month to see what's new and look at the digs. It's by far the most amazing place. You see it all, that the Bible really happened. It's amazing."

It is his deep love of and appreciation for the city that gives him the strength to continue pursuing his goals for Jerusalem. "In a recent poll, we saw that people feel there is a positive momentum in the city," he said. "We have already made a big difference in the atmosphere."

Although the road ahead is a long and bumpy one, Barkat said that with the help of the Jewish communities of the Diaspora, he's confident about the future.

"Jews in the Diaspora should see themselves as shareholders of the city of Jerusalem," he said. "If people think that way, we will improve and strengthen the city much faster. I spend 100 per cent of my time focusing on how to improve Jerusalem, and I would love to see the world partner with us here."

The Jerusalem Foundation has adopted the classical term "builder" to pay tribute to several Canadian philanthropists who have made important contributions to building the city.

Among the Canadian "builders" to be honoured at the gala at the Four Seasons in Toronto are the Asper family; the Azrieli family; Leslie and Anna Dan; Henry and Julia Koschitzky, and Isadore and Rosalie Sharp.

Two other Canadian families will receive special honours for making lifetime investments in Jerusalem: the Desmarais and the Bloomfield families, who received the Teddy Kollek Award in 2007 and 2009, respectively.

"The Jerusalem Foundation is thrilled to have Mayor Barkat on side," the foundation's Steve Solomon said. "Mayor Barkat, like the founder of the Jerusalem Foundation, former Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek, is a very engaged partner.

"We share a certain vision and energy, a passion for getting things done, and for Jerusalem. He's committed to the same concept of building."

Iran hints at acceptance of nuclear deal with West

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Iran's foreign minister said the Islamic Republic could endorse a United Nations-brokered deal for it to send potential nuclear fuel abroad for processing, contradicting lawmakers who rejected the plan as a trap.

The remark, made on Monday by Manouchehr Mottaki, was the most positive yet from a senior Iranian official and hinted at fierce backroom debate between hardliners and moderates in the faction-ridden Iranian leadership on whether to accept the deal.

UN inspectors, meanwhile, examined on Monday a hitherto secret uranium enrichment site bunkered inside a mountain to verify Tehran's stance that the plant was meant to make only low-enriched fuel for electricity, not the high-purity version for nuclear arms.

Understandings on the fuel plan and outside access to the enrichment plant under construction were struck at high-level Geneva talks between Iran and six world powers on Oct. 1.

They see the deals as litmus tests of Iran's stated intent to use enriched uranium only for peaceful ends, and a basis for more ambitious negotiations on curbing enrichment in Iran to defuse a crisis over its disputed nuclear aspirations.

Mottaki said Iran could either send part of its low-enriched uranium (LEU) stockpile abroad for specialized processing into fuel for a Tehran nuclear medicine facility that is running out of it, or buy the material from foreign suppliers.

"In order to obtain this fuel, we might spend money as in the past or we might present part of the fuel that we have right now, and currently do not need, for further processing," he was quoted by the official news agency IRNA as saying.

He said the Islamic Republic would announce its decision "in the next few days." Iran missed a deadline last Friday set by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) chief for giving a reply to the proposal he hammered out in consultations with Iran, Russia, France and the United States in Vienna last week.

Prominent lawmakers have said since then that Iran should not send out any of its LEU reserve, suggesting it was a strategic asset Tehran could not afford to relinquish while facing western pressure to shelve enrichment entirely.

But some officials have privately suggested Iran in the end is likely to accept the deal, although it remained unclear how much LEU Tehran would agree to shift abroad, and when.

One Tehran analyst, who declined to be named, said the outcry over the draft would allow Iran to present its eventual acceptance as a major concession in the hope this would deflate pressure on it to shelve enrichment, a step it rules out.

The draft pact calls for Iran to transfer some 80 per cent of its known 1.5 tons of LEU to Russia for further enrichment by the end of this year, then to France for conversion into fuel plates. These would be returned to Tehran to fuel a research reactor that produces radioisotopes for cancer treatment.

The U.S. role would be upgrading the reactor's safety and instrumentation, Iran's envoy to the UN watchdog said.

Egypt's recant too late for Israelis

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israeli scientists were given permission by Egypt to participate in a breast cancer research and awareness conference in Cairo hosted by Susan G. Komen for the Cure after their original invitations to the event had been revoked at the last minute by Egyptian Health Minister Hatem el-Gabali.

Susan G. Komen for the Cure, a prominent advocacy group for breast cancer research, was ultimately successful in reversing the Egyptian minister's decision.

However, according to sources familiar with members of the Israeli scientific team, the Egyptian change of heart came too late for the Israelis to be able to join the conference.

The original invitation for the Israelis to attend the conference had been rescinded by el-Gabali, even though the Israelis had already received security clearance from Egypt to attend.

Yossi Levy, spokesperson for Israel's Foreign Ministry, last week said his office was in discussion with his Egyptian counterparts about clarifying the decision to revoke the invitation to the Israelis.

"Everything was taken care of [the team] had the necessary documentation. We still don't know why they weren't allowed in."

The Anti-Defamation League last Monday called on Susan G. Komen for the Cure to ensure that the Israeli researchers be permitted to participate in the weeklong event that began on Oct. 21.

"We find this last-minute exclusion of Israeli experts shocking and contrary to the stated purpose of these programs – to promote regional co-operation to highlight breast cancer awareness, research and best treatment practices – and inimical to the ideals and goals of your organization," Abraham Foxman, ADL's national director, said in a letter to Hala Moddelmog, president and CEO of Susan G. Komen for the Cure.

According to a notice on the advocacy group's website, representatives of 10 Middle East nations were scheduled to participate in the conference, which the group said was undertaken with "unprecedented co-operation aimed at elevating awareness of breast cancer in the region and beyond."

The conference was held under the auspices of Egypt's first lady, Suzanne Mubarak, and supported by the Suzanne Mubarak Women's International Peace Movement, the Egyptian Ministry of Health and the United States Agency for International Development, with assistance from the Institute of International Education and the Johns Hopkins University Center for Communication Programs.

This was the second time in less than a week that Egypt had prevented Israelis from entering the country for the purpose of attending a conference. On Oct. 9, the Egyptian Foreign Ministry refused to grant a visa to Yossi Gordon, the head of the Association of Contractors and Builders in Israel.

A grim and elegiac film from Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

David Grossman's taut novel, Someone To Run With, which was made into a Hebrew-language movie in 2006 by Oded Davidoff, will be screened by the Toronto Jewish Film Festival on Sunday, Nov. 1, at 5 p.m. at the SilverCity theatre in Richmond Hill.

Davidoff's film, set mainly in Jerusalem in the 1990s, is at once grim and elegiac, turning on two young Israelis who fall romantically into each other's arms thanks to a lost golden Labrador dog found wandering the city streets.

Assaf (Yonatan Bar-Or), a shy and awkward 17-year-old, is asked to track down Dinka, the frisky hound in question. She belongs to Tamar (Bar Belfer), 16, a gifted musician and singer who has run away from home for reasons that are never explained.

Nearly two hours in length, the film shifts seamlessly between Assaf and Tamar. As Assaf leads Dinka along on a leash, he gets closer to piecing together Tamar's story, but he also elicits the interest of the police drug squad.

A guitar slung over her shoulder, Tamar wanders around Jerusalem, playing and singing to survive. Her songs are sweet, plaintive, soulful and mature beyond her years.

Requiring shelter, she finds refuge in a seedy halfway house presided over by Pesach (Tzahi Grad), a disreputable, tyrannical figure who brooks no dissent or, supposedly, drugs.

The place is filled with misfits, including Shelly (Rinat Matatov), an older woman who befriends Tamar, and Shai (Yuval Mendelson), a brilliant but spaced-out guitarist.

In documenting Assaf's quest to find Tamar, Davidoff takes a viewer into the dark underbelly of Jerusalem, inhabited by the rejects of society. This is definitely not Naomi Shemer's mythical Jerusalem of Gold, to say the least.

The best thing about Someone To Run With is the enormously talented actress who portrays Tamar.

A luminous presence whose eyes and voice command immediate attention, Belfer is the glue that holds this generally poignant film together.

Though modest in scope, Someone To Run With covers a lot of ground.

Bar Belfer plays Tamar in Someone to Run With.

Over My Dad's Body is a real-life thriller

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

It has all the makings of a good Robert Ludlum book: mistaken identity, the KGB, and paranoia. It takes place in Israel and in a prison block in the former Soviet Union. But Over My Dad's Body is a true story.

The documentary, screening on Nov. 10 as part of the 17th Rendevous With Madness Film Festival, is about filmmaker Taliya Finkel's search for the true identity of her uncle and her attempts to come to terms with her father's illness.

In 1973, long before she was born, her father, Shmuel, made aliyah from Chernovitz, then in the Soviet Union. His brother, Sterik, was in a Soviet prison at the time but upon his release about two years later, he, too, moved to Israel.

Years later, Shmuel began to assert that Sterik wasn't really his brother. He believed his brother was killed, and this man was an imposter sent by the KGB to spy on Israel. Sterik refused to do a DNA test, and Shmuel believed that his brother was out to kill him.

Shmuel was diagnosed shortly thereafter with schizophrenia and descended into bouts of paranoia, believing his house was bugged.

That aside, his daughter wanted to find the truth. The basic premise of this film is, can a man diagnosed with schizophrenia and prone to flights of fancy tell the truth? She hires a private investigator and the two of them fly to Ukraine to dig into her uncle's past. A letter she receives from Israel's security service only deepens the mystery. It's interesting, too, that her uncle refused to be interviewed for this film.

The documentary is interspersed with footage she took of her father before he committed suicide in a psychiatric hospital. As a teenager, Finkel was embarrassed of her father and making this movie, and searching for the truth, obviously serves as a catharsis for her.

This is a disturbing and deeply moving documentary.

Shmuel Finkel

Poetry reflects a love of Israel

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Canadian playwright and poet Brandon Marlon loves Israel. That should be obvious to anyone reading Judean Dreams, his collection of almost 150 poems, all of which deal with Israel or Judaism.

"I am drawn to the history of Israel, the landscape and the tradition," Marlon, 30, says from his home in Ottawa. "It is the homeland. Israel has captured the imagination of all people, not just Jews."

Judean Dreams is the culmination of a creative period he had while attending the World Union of Jewish Students Institute in Arad, in the Negev. It is divided into 10 sections, including Memory, Tradition, Redemption and Jerusalem.

In one section, Admonition, he takes Israel to task for not being flawless. In the poem Shy Guy in the Land of Chutzpah, he writes: "Passive, civil and polite/ Gets you nowhere in a flash/ Among high-volume car horns/ Among vibrating hand gestures."

Marlon says that since its inception, the State of Israel has always been in a struggle to survive. "Because of that, it hasn't been able to dedicate itself to politeness, refinements and all the 'trappings' of civilization. Still, it's done pretty well for a 61-year-old country."

Marlon is not afraid to admit that maybe he pines for a more romantic view of Israel. In Gates Decayed he writes: "And I sense increasingly/ That my century has been missed/ But by a mere millennium or two."

"I would have been more suited to ancient times," he says. "I yearn for times that were simple and sincere and not about owning real estate or getting a paycheque."

His romanticism also reveals itself in I Have A Dream in which he envisions an Israel where synagogues are packed on Shabbat and the air is "congested with prayer."

"Minds are at peace/ Hearts are overflowing/ Spirits soar skyward/ All because Man walks humbly with his maker/ As attending angels look on with envy," he writes.

But if Brandon admonishes Israel, it's only the way a loving parent admonishes a child who has strayed. More than anything, Judean Dreams is a collection of love poems dedicated to Israel.

In Holy City Home, he writes: "O Jerusalem, how unlike any other!/ If I were you I would blush red/ At all the words written about you/ At all the lyrics singing your praise."

In the section called Romance, this relationship enters somewhat erotic waters. In Embedded he writes: "I am in you like a crumpled note/ Tucked into a Kotel crevice/ Like each folded piece of paper/ I will only be extracted from you for burial."

Judean Dreams touches on all sorts of themes. In Torah he touches upon the spiritual. In others he describes the landscape or relates Israel's history. Some, like May It Be Your Will, are prayers.

It is published by Bayeux Arts and can be ordered from Amazon and at most bookstores.

Israeli animator works in a 'dream career'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Tatia Rosenthal is a niche filmmaker par excellence.

The 38-year-old Israeli specializes in puppet animation films for adults.

Her first feature, $9.99, a surreal, existential story about the meaning of life that critics have compared to Robert Altman's Short Cuts, was screened at the International Animation Festival in Ottawa recently and at the Toronto International Film Festival last year.

Bought by distributors in the United States, France, Australia and Canada, $9.99 is due to open in Canadian theatres in the near future.

Seven years in the making, and the first Australian-Israeli co-production, $9.99 is based on the magic realist short stories of Israeli writer Etgar Keret, and was adapted for the screen by the novelist and Rosenthal.

Chronicling the lives of a rich cast of characters in an apartment building, including a magician in debt and a bewitching woman who has a yen for a certain kind of man, it features voiceovers from actors Geoffrey Rush and Anthony LaPaglia, among others.

Rosenthal, a graduate of New York University's Tisch School of the Arts majoring in animation, was delighted to make $9.99.

"It was a fantastic experience," she said in an interview from Ottawa last week. "I got to make my absolute dream film. The only restraints were financial, not creative, which is a very rare experience in this business."

Tatia Rosenthal

Although their script garnered grants and fellowships, they were unable to find a producer. "A week before we finally found financing, I was ready to give up," she admitted.

Emile Sherman, an Australian producer, agreed to come on board, and he joined forces with Amir Harel, a producer in Israel whose credits include Walking on Water and Jellyfish.

It was shot on a budget of $3.5 million, with filming taking place in Sydney, Australia, in 2007. Post-production began in Tel Aviv in 2008.

To the best of Rosenthal's knowledge, $9.99 is only the second co-Israeli puppet animation film in about 40 years.

Puppet animation is a time-consuming craft in which an animator can usually produce only five seconds of finished film per day, due in part to the fact that puppets constantly have to be moved into various positions.

And to convey genuine emotions, the body language must be evocative and the lighting and music must be just right, Rosenthal added. "It's quite a challenging process."

Considering the built-in difficulties of puppet animation, it is not surprising that there are so few such animators. Rosenthal knows of two or three in Israel and thinks there may be a few hundred in the United States.

"I'm not sure how many Canadians work in it, but Canada has been very supportive of animation through the National Film Board."

As might be expected, most puppet animation films are expressly made for children, with only a handful for grownups. "The audience for adult puppet animation films, though limited, is growing and becoming more mainstream," she said. "It probably started with The Simpsons, which is drawn animation."

Rosenthal, an only child, grew up in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. Her father, Rico, was a hotel manager until he retired, and her mother, Yolanda, is in business.

"My love for film and animation started in high school. I was interested in all sorts of things, but it was only when I watched The World According to Garp, which combined live action with wonderful animation, that I was first drawn to film and animation as a dream career."

After completing her obligatory army service, working as a computer operator in the civil defence corps, she went abroad, like many Israelis.

At film school in New York City, Rosenthal made her first animated short, Crazy Glue (1998), and followed it up with a longer short, A Buck's Worth (2005), which cost around $90,000.

From 1998 to 2006, Rosenthal was an animator for two children's shows on the Nickelodeon TV channel, Blue's Clues and The Wonder Pets.

Since $9.99, Rosenthal, who is single, has been a freelancer and a teacher at the School of Visual Arts in New York City.

In the not too distant future, she hopes to adapt another adult book into an animated feature film. "I want to work with material I love."

Rosenthal does not know whether she will ever return to her homeland to live, but she would be thrilled to make a film in Israel.

JEWISH PLAYWRIGHTS FESTIVAL SEEKS SUBMISSIONS

The Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company has announced plans to host In the Beginning: A Jewish Playwrights Festival at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre next March. The festival aims to encourage the emergence of "groundbreaking Jewish voices that challenge the Jewish perspective," a press release indicated.

The company wants to expand the current canon of Jewish theatre in Canada by assisting in the development of new theatrical works, potentially to the point of full stage productions. Four playwrights' scripts are to be workshopped with professional actors and a director, and each will receive a public staged reading at the festival.

Both emerging and established playwrights are being encouraged to submit works. To be eligible, a playwright must be Canadian and self-identify as Jewish. The play must be at least 60 minutes in length, in English, and preferably consist of Jewish content. Submission deadline is Dec. 15, 5 p.m. For full submission guidelines, e-mail info@hgjewishtheatre.com or visit www.hgjewishtheatre.com

Recent Internet discoveries, literary and not

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

The Internet, at times the source of curious obsessions such as a balloon floating above the Colorado landscape or repeated versions of a talk-show host's admittance of "creepy" behaviour, has been coughing up remarkable material from the Jewish cultural past.

Norman Ravvin

In Canada, the CBC Digital Archives plays a steady catalogue of early performances and interviews with Leonard Cohen and Mordecai Richler, the most entertaining of which is the 1966 meeting between a young Adrienne Clarkson and a largely deferential Cohen as they discuss why critics are calling his novel Beautiful Losers "the most revolting book ever written in Canada."

A striking appearance out of the American past that was, for a time, a YouTube favourite, is the eight-minute routine by a Yiddish comic – decked out in boater and bow tie – going by the name of Shepsil Kanarek. Playing on the Old World-New World divide in America, the routine recounts, largely but not entirely in Yiddish, the efforts of a cantorial hopeful to impress synagogue committees made up of presidents, treasurers and their wives. The highlight of the piece is Kanarek's habit, when sensing that his voice might give out, of producing a raw egg from his jacket, piercing its end and drinking it down like a Jewish Popeye before embarking on further ostentatious yashmi'enus.

Kanarek seems to have landed from another planet, his Yiddish humour ("In Poughkeepsie iz geven azoi gepakt...) as lost as the Yiddish vaudeville from which he draws his stand-up style.

Even more startling is the recent appearance on YouTube of the 21-second footage titled Anne Frank: The Only Existing Film Images, posted by Anne Frank House in Amsterdam. What would have once remained in the domain of a few researchers and documentary filmmakers at a fee has received, as of this past week, nearly 2-1/2 million visits. There, on a staid Amsterdam street, the camera captures a newly married couple as they descend a set of stairs, while in the background Anne Frank appears as a bystander on a second-floor balcony.

Anne's iconic status has had a long run, beginning as early as 1952 when the American edition of her diary was published, and buttressed three years later by a successful Broadway play based on the diary. The international success of the diary, its teachability and its appeal to young readers have made it one of the key texts by which we encounter the history of the war.

Anne's face, in numerous photographs that survived the war and entered the public realm, is known like that of no other victim. These pictures compete with a series of iconic images that were equally or better-known in the postwar years, appearing routinely on book covers and in Holocaust-related documentaries. The three that come to mind most readily are: a still taken from Soviet footage of children at Auschwitz shortly after their liberation; an image of a young boy in a cap and knee socks, hands raised before German guns; and a close-up of a religious Jew, prayer shawl about his shoulders, the laughing faces of German army men behind him.

One wonders if the newly revealed footage of Anne Frank will further her role as a paradigmatic victim of Nazi violence – as the face that documentarists and book designers turn to when they need an image evocative of the war, yet one that is not too disturbing.

These concerns are at the heart of Philip Roth's 1979 novel The Ghost Writer, which is about America in the middle '50s. Set in 1956, it captures the moment when the diary was on Broadway, as well as the beginning of an Americanization, some would say the sanitization of the Anne Frank story, making it more appealing to non-Jews and more palatable to Jews in a postwar era when the Cold War, not the Holocaust, was the geopolitical story of the day.

Roth is merciless in his criticism of the Broadway play's need to highlight Anne's upbeat humanism, deriving its message from one line from the diary: "I still believe that people are really good at heart," while avoiding Anne's recognition of her own identity: "It might even be our religion from which the world and all peoples learn good... We can never become just Netherlanders... we will always remain Jews."

The ingenious turn in The Ghost Writer, alongside Roth's critique of the diary's reception, is his imagining the possibility of Anne alive, after the war, a young woman with writerly ambitions. Proof of the latter is central to Anne's own sense of herself in the diary, where she wrote in May 1944 that her "greatest wish is to become a journalist someday and later on a famous writer."

Roth gives Anne her due, mining the diary for its writerly sophistication, its imaginative power and its particularity. The Ghost Writer has the effect of dispelling aspects of the legendary Anne – the smiling, girlish face, happy in the world – which contribute to a forgetting of her final days at Auschwitz and Bergen-Belsen. Each viewer of the prewar footage of her will contend with the impact of Anne's reappearance, momentary, endlessly repeatable, on YouTube.

Talks continue over keeping Montreal Y open on Shabbat

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The conditions under which the YM-YWHA Ben Weider Jewish Community Centre opens for the first time on Shabbat at the end of this month remained under discussion as The CJN went to press.

An agreement between the Y administration and a delegation of Orthodox congregational rabbis appeared to have been close to finalization midway through last week but, for unexplained reasons, matters were halted and talks were expected to resume early this week.

Rabbi Adam Scheier of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim said an understanding had been reached that the Y would not open its cardiovascular training facility, which houses electrically operated equipment, or play music on Shabbat. The concession the Y gained was that it would open at 7:30 a.m. on Saturday, instead of the 1 p.m. it had announced.

The deal also received informal approval from "the overwhelming consensus" of the Montreal Board of Rabbis, an interdenominational association of mainstream pulpit rabbis, said Rabbi Scheier, its current president. He stressed that this was a "compromise" position, and that the board reiterated its original stance that the Y should remain closed throughout Shabbat. The talks were facilitated by Federation CJA, of which the Y is an agency and beneficiary.

Partial information about the agreement in progress was leaked to the media and quickly spread through the Internet, which apparently prompted the two sides to reconsider.

On Aug. 10, the Y's boards of directors and governors passed a resolution that the Ben Weider JCC's fitness facilities would be open on Saturdays from 1 p.m. as of Oct. 31.

Facilities to be in operation would be the two gyms, the swimming pool, the weight-training room and the cardio centre. There would be no organized programs, no exchange of money, and the registration desk and restaurant, which is under the kashrut supervision of the Vaad Ha'ir, would remain closed.

At that time, the Board of Rabbis had publicly called on the Y to reverse its decision, saying that operating on Shabbat would break with a longstanding tradition among Montreal Jewish institutions of not opening or holding events on Shabbat, and would "undermine the cohesiveness that Montreal Jews have enjoyed for generations."

The news of a deal between the rabbis and the Y was denounced by the Vaad Harabbonim of Montreal, the rabbinical court. In a statement headlined "Shabbos Sanctity cannot be compromised" and signed "with pain in our hearts," the Vaad said, "The master of the universe instructed us to protect and safeguard the holiest of days, and neither we nor any other human being has the power to compromise."

By last Friday, the only comment the Y would make was that it had "engaged in discussions with the rabbinical leadership and will be pleased to offer comment following announcement of an accord," referring to the delegation of modern Orthodox rabbis.

If there is no deal with the rabbis, the Y will go ahead with opening on Saturday according to the terms of its August resolution.

The Y's opening on Shabbat is currently restricted to two synagogues that operate out of its premises. The Y administration also resolved in August to explore the possibility of additional Jewish programming on Saturdays. Rabbi Scheier said one of the other points that had been provisionally agreed upon was that an ad hoc committee of Y board members and rabbis would develop non-recreational Shabbat programming at the Ben Weider JCC. (The new Shabbat hours will not come into effect at the Y's West Island branch.)

The cardio centre is one of the Y's most popular features, and it has just undergone a major renovation and enlargement and upgrade of its equipment, including the addition of 20 new pieces of equipment, described as state of the art. The facelift was made possible by a donation from the Ben Weider Foundation and anonymous donors, according to a brochure from the Y.

The Y's decision to open on Shabbat has caused an uproar in the Montreal Jewish community and beyond, with opposition coming not only from its very large observant segment, but many others who believe the century-old Y should maintain Jewish tradition.

In light of the fact that the Y has insisted it will nevertheless go ahead with Shabbat opening, the mainstream rabbis felt they had to work with the Y to minimize the most egregious violations of Halachah, namely the triggering of an electrical current. They also felt such a conciliation would preserve community unity.

(The Y, incidentally, is not within an eruv, although there are plans to extend the Côte St. Luc/Hampstead eruv into Côte des Neiges.)

Operating Saturday morning was apparently a result of the rabbis' assertion that they are not against Shabbat opening because they fear it will draw people away from synagogue services. As Rabbi Reuben Poupko, who was among those in the talks with the Y, has said, "We are not in competition with the Y."

Rabbi Scheier said it should not be inferred that even if the concessions under discussion are affirmed that this means the Y is in total compliance with Halachah. He acknowledged that there are members of the Board of Rabbis who are against the proposed accord. "Certainly, there are dissenting opinions, but this would be a positive step for the community."

Bil'in case being appealed

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — The West Bank Palestinian village that wants to sue two Quebec-registered companies building homes for Jewish settlers on lands claimed by the village is appealing a court decision made here in September.

Quebec Superior Court justice Louis-Paul Cullen decided the case would not be heard in Quebec, upholding the defendants' motion asking that the court exempt itself from the case.

Mark Arnold, the Toronto-based lawyer for Bil'in and 11 of its residents, filed an appeal with Quebec Court of Appeal on Oct. 19.

The appeal alleges that Superior Court made grievous legal and factual errors in declining jurisdiction. He argues that Israeli courts have "consistently ruled that the question of the legality of settlements [for Israeli citizens only] under the Fourth Geneva Convention to be a matter of politics that the Israeli High Court of Justice will not hear."

The civil suit was brought against Green Park International Inc. and Green Mount International Inc., and their sole director, a resident of Quebec.

The lawsuit is based on Article 49(6) of the Fourth Geneva Convention, which prohibits an occupying power from transferring its own population into an occupied territory.

The litigants want a halt to construction, demolition of existing residential units and $2 million in punitive damages.

In a 67-page decision, Cullen ruled that the High Court of Justice is "clearly the logical forum and the authority in a better position" to deal with this dispute.

He said a Quebec court could have jurisdiction to hear a civil action stemming from a wrong suffered in a foreign country if the defendants live in the province, but in this instance the local connection is "merely superficial."

Sisters not board with ultimate strategy game

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A couple of times a week, sisters Rebecca and Melissa Giblon head to a room in their Thornhill home while their dad, Andrew, takes a chessboard and sits down in another.

Then they start to play, Andrew with the board in front of him, Rebecca and Melissa relying solely on their memories and imagination to visualize the placement of the knights and pawns, listening to their dad's moves and instructing him where to move their pieces.

Although new to blind chess, the girls, who play as a team, can go about 15 to 20 moves before they lose track of the board and begin to run into trouble, Andrew said.

Still, that's not too bad, considering the complexity of the game and the need to recall the placement of all 32 pieces.

Rebecca and Melissa are clearly no ordinary chess players. Though only 11 and 10 respectively, they're Canadian champions in their age groups. Andrew, by contrast, admits to being only a middling tournament player.

There are a number of theories as to what it takes to be an accomplished chess player. Andrew believes it's half natural ability – the ability to think logically, analyze moves, recognize patterns – and half hard work – solving chess puzzles, reading books and playing games.

For Rebecca, there's another element at play: "I really like how it's an intellectual challenge," she said in a telephone conversation. "It makes me feel really good to spot a tactic or a combination. It's like solving a puzzle."

Melissa likewise enjoys employing her thinking processes. "It's kind of like you can play a game and have fun and use your mind to figure out the best kind of things to do," she said.

Both girls relish competitions, and in 2007, their breakout year, Rebecca was crowned Canada's under-10 champion in her first appearance at a national tournament.

That same year, Melissa tied for third in the under-8 category. Both made it onto the Canadian national team and participated in an international tournament that attracted 1,500 players from nearly 200 countries. Rebecca finished 59th out of 105 competitors in her age group; Melissa was 40th out of 72.

Both girls began their chess careers while still in Grade 1, taking group lessons at the local community centre. They were inspired by their older cousin, Simon Gladstone, who was a top player in his age group at the time.

After a couple of years, Rebecca graduated to private lessons under Roman Pelts, an international master and three-time Canadian chess Olympian.

Melissa followed suit and Andrew, to ensure they would have a worthy opponent in "sparring" sessions, joined them in the lessons.

The girls put in at least one hour a day (often closer to two) in studying the game, and twice a week they play games that can last one to three hours each. They also switched coaches to Yan Teplitsky, a former Canadian Olympic team player, and they work with him twice a week in two-hour sessions.

Their hard work clearly paid off when this past season, they each became Ontario Youth Chess Champions and then advanced to the Canadian Youth Chess Championships in Victoria in July.

Blindfolded chess, which was recently added to their training repertoire, "is designed to allow them to visualize and train them to calculate positions in their head," Andrew said.

So why are his daughters so good at the game?

"On the one hand, they're each gifted scholastically," Andrew responds.

Although they finished three or four years at Leo Baeck Day School, they now attend Henderson Avenue Public School in Thornhill, which is geared to gifted children. They still make time for private Hebrew lessons as well as group classes, and they swim, ski and engage in other activities as well.

And they put in the work.

In mid-November, Andrew will take off three weeks to accompany his girls to the World Youth Chess Championships in Antalya, Turkey.

"I'm not expecting them to make chess a career, but it's is a fantastic way to see parts of Canada and the world they wouldn't otherwise have seen," he said.

Maccabi Tel Aviv coach thrown out of exhibition game

JTA

NEW YORK — The head coach of the Maccabi Tel Aviv basketball team refused to leave the court following his ejection from an exhibition game against the New York Knicks last week.

Pini Gershon delayed play in Madison Square Garden for 10 minutes after he wouldn't exit after his second technical foul in the third quarter led to an automatic ejection.

Security officials from the NBA and Madison Square Garden tried to lead Gershon off the floor. Rabbi Yitzchak Dovid Grossman of the youth village Migdal Ohr, which was benefiting from the night's proceeds, also tried to intercede, asking officials to let the coach stay.

The Knicks defeated Maccabi, 106-91.

Minor wounds, small blessings

By MICHAEL GORDON

The Senior Side of Life

It was a bit unusual. I was taking a few hours of call on-site at the hospital. The scheduled person was sick, and a number of the senior staff physicians agreed to do the call to assure on-site medical coverage. I was assigned three hours on a Saturday afternoon and evening. I hoped things would be quiet, as acute-care medicine was not part of my normal clinical activities.

Things progressed quietly when my pager went off. I identified myself on the phone, to which there was a momentary pause and then a request to attend to a patient on the unit for those suffering from dementia, with its associated behavioural challenges. The patient had fallen and had a few minor lacerations that I was being asked to examine.

When I entered the unit, the nurse who called me said, "I thought it was you by your voice and name, but I didn't expect you to be doing in-house call. What happened to the young doctors that usually do this?" I explained the situation. She told one of the other nurses, who was clearly junior, that I had been the chief of medicine and recounted a number of our previous good-humoured interactions years before.

With this background of positive feeling, I asked to see the patient, who was approaching us. He was slightly stooped and walking slowly, indicative of medications often used in individuals with significant behavioural problems associated with dementia.

I shook his hand and introduced myself as a physician. He hesitantly gave me his name with an accent that I recognized as being British. As I checked the wound below the bandage, I engaged him in conversation about his place of birth, and he identified his birthplace as England, but when I asked about his name, he indicated that it was Scottish, to which I replied that I had studied medicine in Scotland. He smiled and looked at me with some apparent recognition as I named the university.

The examination concluded, and I wrote my computer note, much to the satisfaction of the nurse. I left the unit and later realized that I had left my stethoscope on the desk while typing my note. While returning on the elevator, the patient whom I had attended to was returning to the floor with his wife, who was affectionately holding his hand.

"You're the doctor who visited my husband after his fall," she said, smiling. "Thank you very much for seeing him on such short notice. I hope that when the dressing comes off he is as good-looking as he usually is."

I replied, "I'm sure he'll look wonderful. The nurses did a fine job in closing the small gap. The cut was not deep enough to need stitches. And I had a nice chat with him about his place of birth."

As they walked away when the elevator opened, she said, "He lived in England during his youth, but was of good Scottish stock." It was said with enormous warmth and affection.

As they walked away still holding hands, I could see the vestiges of what must have been a long, caring and loving marriage, one that even the terrible effects of dementia could not dissolve.

I retrieved my stethoscope, thanked the nurses again and thought to myself that even a minor medical event can remind us what this enterprise of medical and nursing care is all about, and that the power of loving, longstanding relationships can be a bulwark against the ravages of illnesses that affect the mind.

Feeding active kids

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

If you have busy kids involved in sports, swimming or dance, here are some tips on the best ways to hydrate and feed them.

When kids are active, what they eat and drink can have an important effect on their performance.

The most important dietary element for any active person is fluid replacement. The recommended amount to drink is approximately 100 to 150 millilitres (or about 1/2 cup) for every 15 to 30 minutes of activity. A child playing one hour of hockey requires about 1-1/2 to two cups fluid to replace losses. Plenty of fluid is recommended for active kids.

What is the best source of fluids? Water! For regular childhood activity in sports as opposed to intense sessions, water is the ideal source of hydration.

What to eat before a game or practice, and when? The best fuel is a mixed meal, a combination of protein and carbohydrates, which can also include fruit and vegetables. Meals or snacks should not be high in sugar, fat or salt. The size of the meal or snack will depend on the player and the time of day. Ideally, it is best to eat meals two to four hours before.

High-fat foods should be limited prior to performance as they slow digestion and can cause discomfort as well as prevent rapid access to nutrients.

Following are some balanced snack ideas to offer before games or practices.

- apple with cheese
- whole grain toast with peanut butter or almond butter
- whole grain cereal with milk or yogurt
- Banana plus 20 nuts (almonds, walnuts or pistachios are best)
- yogurt and granola
- toast and eggs
- tuna or turkey sandwich
- smoothie with fruit, yogurt and milk
- raw vegetables with hummus
- whole wheat pita with hummus

When kids become involved in more intense sport or prolonged, demanding sessions, the recommendations and requirements may be different.

$84.54 later, life is just fine

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Life has its struggles, some of which are mitigated by shopping at No Frills with my boy, Noah River.

Once inside the store, we head over to the vegetable and fruit section, grab a half-dozen apples and peel stickers from two of them. We put them on our noses. Months ago, Noah refused to go along with my antics but has since acquiesced. This sets the tone for the rest of our supermarket adventure and puts a smile on the faces of grumpy shoppers.

We choose our yellow peppers, celery, lettuce and tomatoes. Noah puts them in the plastic bags. Sometimes a tomato falls and rolls away. He'll ask me to purchase stuff like kale. We never eat it. I hate throwing out food.

As we roll along, shopping-friends stop and ask us how we're doing. We'll say to them: "Oh do, we have stickers on our noses?" The funny people will say, "Yes, how much do you guys cost?" We say, "$2.95." Sometimes we're $4.00.

Noah and I say hello to Pat, a store manager, and the people who work the floors. They all know us. It's nice. The store has become a place for us to hang our hats, be silly and accepted. Recently, I shopped by myself. Some of the employees frowned and wondered aloud where my little guy was.

There are several supermarket activities you can share with your toddler. Find a quiet aisle, line up your cart and giving it a good, solid and sensible push. Me and my boy do this a bunch of times. As he rolls away, Noah lets out a booming "weee," which is quite audible to shoppers aisles away.

Other times, weaving our way through the plastic doors, we'll check out the back room, where products are stocked. The guys back there show us, with great respect, how the stacker works and why boxes don't implode into each other. That's when Noah stops, concentrates, and his beautiful brown eyes open widely. In those eyes, you can see hundreds of questions.

When I used to shop with my Aunt Sylvia at a bulk-food place, we would always taste-test a couple of chocolates, a sort of petty thievery. Since I had my little boy, I've amended my ways. Instead, Noah and I drink products off the shelf while we shop, which we pay for later. One per cent chocolate milk is our drink of choice.

Our shopping list is pretty consistent and includes soya dinners, whole wheat pasta, goat milk, cheese (cheddar or havarti). Noah is a vegetarian. ('Do vegetarians eat animal crackers?' – author unknown)

Every week, Noah can choose a new product. He chose apple cider once. I'm not fond of it. It sits quietly unused in an empty cupboard.

Our supermarket has a relaxed environment. Once we've paid for and bagged our groceries, we'll find an empty check out and I'll plop Noah down on the conveyor belt. I press the button that makes it move, and Little Man rides back and forth without interruption. People who looked cheerless, smile.

When Noah and I shop, we see women carting around three or more children, shopping assiduously, sometimes with two carts. They work hard. Noah and I talk to Filipino families, Russians, Israelis, Jamaican moms and East Indian shoppers.

We see older men and women on their own. Many will speak Yiddish to my boy. You can detect loneliness in a supermarket.

Shopping for our food takes one hour. When it's done, we return the cart and get our quarter back, and take the stickers off our noses. We hug each other.

$84.54 later, life is just fine.

Schools take all H1N1 precautions

By JANICE ARNOLD
and FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporters

Schools in Montreal and Toronto were re-emphasizing the importance of vigilance and prevention last week as vaccination programs rolled out and concerns among parents mounted after two Ontario children died from the H1N1 virus.

As of Monday morning, there were no unusual patterns of absenteeism at Toronto's Bialik Hebrew Day School, according to head of school Shana Harris.

But, because of concerns about the H1N1 flu virus, "we're monitoring [attendance] on a daily basis," she added.

Bialik, which has 812 students, has had "a few cases here and there," Harris said last week, based on information the school has received from parents who have reported the illness.

Guidelines that the Toronto school has sent to parents emphasize the importance of hand hygiene in minimizing the spread of infection. As well, parents are requested to keep children home if they have flu symptoms, including a fever of 38 degrees Celsius or higher, and not send them back until they are fever-free for 48 hours, Harris said.

If students become ill at school, they are sent home. "We sent a child home this morning with fever and coughing," Harris said last Wednesday.

"Our prime focus at the moment is trying to prevent the spread. Teachers are encouraging students to wash their hands before eating."

As well, she added, hand sanitizers are available in the office, in classrooms and at the entrance to the school.

In the event that a large number of people are affected, Bialik would try to bring in supply teachers and "may have to look at putting classes together," Harris said.

At Associated Hebrew Schools – Toronto's largest day school, with a total of 1,640 students at three campuses – director of education Mark Smiley told The CJN on Monday morning, "It's business as usual."

The school had two suspected cases of H1N1 last week, he added. One turned out not to be H1N1, but Smiley said the school did not know yet about the second case.

Canada

Sentence Lauded

MONTREAL — Quebec Jewish Congress (QJC) applauded the life sentence given to Rwandan war criminal Desire Munyaneza by Quebec Superior Court Oct. 29. Found guilty last May of helping to organize the 1994 genocide in Rwanda, he's the first person to be prosecuted under Canada's new crimes against humanity and war crimes act. "This judgment is a tremendous step forward," said QJC president Adam Atlas, who was at the sentencing. "Canada will not allow itself to be used as a refuge for war criminals. They will be prosecuted to the full extent of the law." The judge ordered that Munyaneza have no chance of parole for 25 years, the toughest penalty under the law. His lawyer has appealed.

World

Politician Apologizes

BUFFALO — A possible contender for New York governor apologized for comparing an Orthodox Jewish lawmaker to Adolf Hitler and the Antichrist. Chris Collins, the Erie County executive, came under fire for saying in an Oct. 24 speech to fellow Republicans in Buffalo that he was "pretty sure" the third Antichrist is state assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver, referring to Nostradamus' prediction that three Antichrists will appear before the Apocalypse. Hitler and Napoleon are said to be the first two. The comment referred to Albany's "three men in a room" budget process in which the governor, Senate majority leader and assembly speaker make deals in private. The remarks drew "polite, nervous laughter" one Buffalo Republican told the Buffalo News.

Maccabi Coach Sorry

NEW YORK — An Israeli basketball coach apologized for making a scene after being ejected from his team's exhibition game against the New York Knicks. Pini Gershon, head coach of Maccabi Tel Aviv, delayed the Oct. 18 game in Madison Square Garden for about 10 minutes when he refused to leave the court after being ejected with two technical fouls. Gershon issued an apology last week to NBA commissioner David Stern and Knicks president Donnie Walsh. Maccabi team president Shimon Mizrahi also sent a letter of apology. The New York Times reported that Stern issued a statement in response: "The apology was unnecessary – and accepted. We have only the highest regard for Maccabi Tel Aviv, their ownership, coaches, players, and our longtime friend Shimon Mizrahi."

Anti-Semitism Down

NEW YORK — The level of anti-Semitism in the United States has hit a historic low point, according to a new Anti-Defamation League poll. It found 12 per cent of Americans hold anti-Semitic views, down from 15 per cent in 2007 and matching the 12 per cent figure recorded in 1998. The highest number on record was 29 per cent in 1964. The poll of 1,200 men and women has a margin of error of plus or minus 2.8 per cent. It asks whether they agree with 11 statements about Jews – such as whether they are "more loyal to Israel than America" and whether they have "too much power in the U.S. today" – and are classified as holding anti-Semitic views if they agree with six of them. The poll also found that foreign-born Hispanics and African-Americans continue to hold anti-Semitic views at much greater levels than other Americans, with 35 per cent and 28 per cent of the two groups falling into that category, respectively.

Sect Leader Extradited To Israel

JERUSALEM — The spiritual leader of a religious sect accused of child abuse who once sought refuge in Canada has been extradited to Israel.

Rabbi Elior Chen, 29, was taken directly to a Jerusalem police station for interrogation last Wednesday after landing in Israel from Brazil. He allegedly urged his followers to abuse their children, including beatings, forcing them to eat feces and pouring household cleaners into open wounds to "correct their corrupt souls."

His alleged abuse of one woman's children led to two of them, then aged four and five, being hospitalized in March 2008 in critical condition and another, then three, remaining in a persistent vegetative state. Their mother, who accepted a plea bargain in exchange for her testimony, faces five years in jail.

Rabbi Chen, who was initially reported to have fled Israel for Canada, was arrested in June 2008 in Sao Paulo. He fought extradition all the way to Brazil's Supreme Court, which rejected his appeal last May.

'Defying barriers'

Actor discusses her life at UJA event

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

If there's one thing Academy Award-winning actor Marlee Matlin wants hearing people to know, it's that people who are deaf are "just the same as you."

"The only thing we can't do is hear," she told The CJN in an exclusive interview before her appearance at a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto event last week.

Her message at the mid-campaign event, which took place Oct. 28 at Events on the Park (site of the former Inn on the Park), was inspirational and humorous, beginning with her deliberate pushing aside of two slim microphones.

"And I don't need these," she signed, a smile on her expressive face, as her longtime interpreter Jack Jason, who also runs her production company, voiced her remarks for the audience of 700.

Also on the program were Col. Richard Kemp, former commander of British forces in Afghanistan, who recently testified in Israel's defence before the UN Human Rights Council, and singers Ryan and Dan Kowarsky, twins who perform under the name RyanDan.

Ken Tanenbaum, co-chair of UJA's 2010 campaign, announced that $37.2 million has been raised so far, including a total of more than $800,000 from new or non-recent contributors. Last year's campaign raised $65 million, and the goal this year is to surpass that, he said.

Matlin – who was diagnosed as profoundly deaf at 18 months because of a congenital condition, and whose memoirs, I'll Scream Later, were published earlier this year – said that, "growing up as a deaf Jewish young woman, life for me was about shunning labels and defying barriers."

Among the obstacles she overcame was preparing for her bat mitzvah. She recalls working hard to learn "to phonetically pronounce the Hebrew that would be part of my Haftorah."

The Chicago native grew up attending Congregation Bene Shalom, a Reform synagogue in Skokie with a mixed congregation of deaf and hearing people, and a rabbi who could both sign and speak.

It was our privilege, too

From the editor's desk...

It is very difficult, if not impossible, to be unmoved by the climactic farewell scene in the film The Pride of the Yankees – the story of the Yankees' famous first baseman Lou Gehrig.

The outstanding ballplayer was struck down at the age of 38 by ALS, amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, the dread disease that would become known by his name.

In full uniform, standing in mid-playing field, present and former teammates nearby, somewhat slouched over a bank of tall microphones, Gary Cooper, playing the role of Gehrig, bids his farewell to the fans at Yankee Stadium.

In halting voice, evidence of the emotion that has overwhelmed him, and perhaps as well, of the disease that has insidiously encroached upon and begun to take over his body, Cooper (Gehrig) speaks.

"I have been walking on ball fields for 16 years, and I've never received anything but kindness and encouragement from you fans. I have had the great honour to have played with these great veteran ballplayers on my left – Murderers Row, our championship team of 1927. I have had the further honour of playing with these men on my right, the Bronx Bombers, the Yankees of today. I have been given fame and undeserved praise by the boys up there behind the wire in the press box – my friends, the sportswriters. I have worked under the two greatest managers of all time, Miller Huggins and Joe McCarthy. I have a mother and father who fought to give me health and a solid background in my youth. I have a wife, a companion for life, who has shown me more courage than I ever knew. People all say that I've had a bad break. But today, I consider myself the luckiest man on the face of the earth."

The film version of Gehrig's farewell speech was slightly altered from the actual one he delivered some two years before he died. But it was true to the spirit and to the language of the original.

What is remarkable about it, however is its content. It is a statement of gratitude. Had Gehrig expressed regret, anger or bitterness at his suddenly shortened career or at the bleak future he now confronted, we would have all understood. But Gehrig chose to single out for individual praise the people who had made his life so special. It was a profoundly moving expression of thankfulness. In his own modest way, he tried to tell us what he believed to be the important lessons of life.

Though we do not differentiate hierarchies of human suffering or distinguish the horrible finality of one disease from that of another, many of us do indeed feel a particular sorrow and shiver when we think of ALS. The sufferer's intellectual, emotional and spiritual capabilities, still vibrant, become encased in and ultimately extinguished by gradual, but ultimately total, physical decline.

Barry Fishman

The celebrity and athleticism of Gehrig's life offered a poignant backdrop for the unique heartbreak of the disease.

Recently, author Mitch Albom, has "updated" the backdrop. In his runaway bestseller of more than a decade ago, Tuesdays with Morrie, Albom recorded and then published myriad life lessons from the many conversations he conducted with his former professor, Morrie Schwartz, over the course of the final few months of Schwartz's life. Schwartz too had contracted ALS.

Albom arranged to meet Morrie regularly – every Tuesday – and talk about life. The book essentially is a compendium of Schwartz's observations as he approached the end of his days.

Schwartz's observations on how to find meaning in one's life was a more professorial iteration of the same insight that Gehrig, in his more compact way, tried to impart.

"The way you get meaning into your life is to devote yourself to loving others, devote yourself to your community around you and devote yourself to creating something that gives you purpose and meaning."

Two weeks ago, Barry Fishman, the former editor of the Ottawa Jewish Bulletin, succumbed to the same disease that took Gehrig's and Schwartz's life. He was 58. (Please see the obituary in this issue.)

Barry was a wonderful man, a human being who cared deeply about the human condition. As Diane Koven has written, Barry was renowned for his kindness and concern for others. He was also a superb editor, a professional of high standards, wise from many years experience, naturally skeptical of course, but not cynical. How proud I was to be his colleague.

Some 19 months before he died, Barry told The CJN, "I am not giving up hope. I am doing my best by trying to have a positive attitude as I face the challenge of living with ALS... I have been humbled by the outpouring of concern and willingness of the readers of the Bulletin to help in any way they can. People who know me only through my work have phoned to offer their assistance. I feel privileged to be part of such a wonderful, caring community."

There were no medical options left for him. In inspiring echoes of both Gehrig and Schwartz, Barry had already focused on the deeper meaning of his life.

It was our privilege to be part of Barry Fishman's community. May his memory be for blessing.

Holocaust Education Week

Partisan's daughter shares family's story

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

"It wasn't easy growing up Bielski, but now everyone wants to be Bielski," said Ruth Bielski Ehrreich, the daughter of the late Tuvia Bielski, the leader of a partisan group depicted in the film Defiance.

Bielski Ehrreich was in Toronto on Sunday for the opening night of the 29th Holocaust Education Week.

Addressing more than 1,000 people who filled the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, she said that whenever she travels to share her family story – which was depicted in Defiance, a Holocaust film about a group of 1,200 Jews led by her father (played by actor Daniel Craig) and uncles who hid from and fought the Nazis while surviving in a Belarussian forest for three years – she is approached by people who claim to be related to her.

"There were people who changed their name from Bielski to other names [after the war], and now when I travel, when I talk about things or we see and discuss the movie, 'I'm related to you,' they tell me. And that gives me a great deal of satisfaction," Bielski Ehrreich said.

Today, it is estimated that there are 10,000 descendants of those who survived the harsh Belarussian winters in the woods as part of the Bielski partisan group.

As Bielski Ehrreich took to the podium, she was emotional, wiping her tears away with a handkerchief.

"The reason the tears come so early in this speech [is because] I've had a very emotional day today," she said, adding that she met with close friends of her late parents.

"I guess I didn't realize the impact that seeing these survivors has on me and will probably always have on me... I think I'm finally beginning to realize that since they're aging and since almost on a monthly basis we're losing [survivors], pretty soon the voices will be silenced, the direct stories will be gone."

She said that speaking with survivors helps her connect with her own parents – her father died in 1987 from stomach cancer and her mother died in 2001.

"In a way I find it very comforting, and in a way I find it very sad," she said.

Bielski Ehrreich shared anecdotes about her mother and father – stories that included their settlement in Israel after the war, and stories about how she idolized her father as a little girl – even before she learned about his heroic story.

"There was almost a holiness when he talked. There was an aura. He was a humble human being. Anyone who knew him would tell you that his most outstanding characteristic was his humility," she said.

She talked about how he struggled to find a way to make a living in Israel, first by opening up a grocery store in Holon, which he had to close when the 1948 War of Independence broke out, and then as a truck driver, transporting fruit throughout the country.

"I had never thought about what he must have felt after coming from a war, living like animals in the woods, trying to hold on to their humanity... and then coming to Israel and having to, in a different way, try to survive."

She said she and her family eventually resettled in Brooklyn, N.Y., just about a mile from where his brother, Zus (played by actor Liev Schreiber in Defiance) lived.

"Our house in Brooklyn was like a revolving door," she said, adding that people in the community were always coming over to socialize, drink vodka and have a good time.

"You never knew from one minute to the next what you were going to find when you came home."

Bielski Ehrreich said that although people were always congregating at her house, there was still an undertone of sadness.

"It was not an ordinary household... it was a more serious upbringing. There was a lot that was demanded of us, there were huge boundaries placed on us – my parents were very strict," she said.

"But when they [other survivors] came, the entire dynamics of the house would change because those were my father's happiest times – to be able to see the people and to be able to see their children was what he lived for."

Bielski Ehrreich said that her father was always very reluctant to talk about his past, but his visitors would often drop hints about his heroism.

"When people would come to the house and say to me and my brothers, 'If it weren't for your father, I wouldn't be here today. You're father is a hero. I have my family today because of what your father did,' I didn't get it in the beginning.

"As I got a little older, I began to wonder about what these people were saying. I began to question my father and reluctantly he sometimes gave me very short answers... But little by little, when my mother would allow him to, he would tell us stories."

She said her mother, Lilka, who met Tuvia when she was a teenager and a member of his partisan group, "was a character herself, and was not only his wife but his protector. She watched everything he did. She took care of every need he had and I marvelled at the self-imposed job she gave herself."

Bielski Ehrreich also spoke about the way her life was affected by being the daughter of Holocaust survivors.

"You can't imagine the expectations, the demands. I think what they wanted for us was what they didn't have in their own lives. Their intentions were very good. They shaped, without teaching us, but by being who they were. By growing up amongst them, they shaped our own lives."

Becoming emotional once more – a characteristic she said she inherited from her father – Bielski Ehrreich said, "There will never be another Tuvia or another Lilka. It is still something that is very hard for me to come to terms with. But doing this is my therapy."

Nurses join exchange program

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Nurses participating in the Schwartz-Reisman Canada-Israel Nursing Executive Exchange have discovered that they have more in common than what separates them.

"We all felt at home [in each other's hospitals], and we learned a lot from each other," said Soshy Goldberg, director of nursing at Tel Aviv's Chaim Sheba Medical Centre, who was here this fall.

The exchange is in partnership with Mount Sinai Hospital's Peter A. Silverman Centre for International Health and its department of nursing.

It was created to allow nurses to collaborate with colleagues from abroad to develop joint research and education programs; to bring new ideas and knowledge to their organizations to improve health-care delivery, innovation, and cost effectiveness, and to assess organizational performance and benchmark against best practices of other organizations and regions.

Leslie Vincent, senior vice-president of patient services and chief nursing executive at Mount Sinai, who travelled to Israel last April with Mary Agnes Beduz, director of nursing education and development at Mount Sinai, said that exchange programs are not uncommon in the academic world and in professional organizations, but this exchange program is different, because it's at the organizational level.

The iron permanence of our affirmation

This week is a uniquely bitter one in modern Jewish history. Seventy-one years ago, on Nov. 10, the Nazi government of Germany let loose a coordinated rampage of humiliation, mayhem and murder against the Jews of Germany. Some historians have demarcated that very dark day as the actual beginning of the Shoah, the Holocaust.

In the introduction to his book Kristallnacht: Prelude to Destruction (HarperCollins Publishers, 2006) renowned historian Martin Gilbert wrote: "Starting in the early hours of 10 November 1938, and continuing until nightfall, violence against the Jews of Germany was unleashed in a whirlwind of destruction. Within a few hours more than a thousand synagogues were set on fire and destroyed… Tens of thousands of Jewish shops and homes were ransacked. Jews were attacked in every German town… In 24 hours of violence, 91 Jews were killed, more than 30,000 Jewish men – a quarter of all Jewish men still in Germany – were arrested and sent to concentration camps."

That is why all across the country this week, Jewish communities are engaged in various activities related to Holocaust Education Week.

The pedagogical point of Holocaust Education Week is clear. We have to teach what happened. We have to always teach what happened.

But there are many other points to this week of educational programming. Among them are at least the following three.

It galvanizes communities into important, focused, common effort. It is an eloquent, pointed refutation of the Holocaust deniers who grow bolder and more numerous each year due to the encouragement and approval of their ignorant beliefs by international celebrities such as Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. And perhaps, most important, Holocaust Education Week enables us to honour the remaining survivors among us, who, with each passing year, alas, become fewer in number.

It is therefore to the remaining survivors we – the next generation – affirm that we will carry their stories forward as our own to the next generation. The iron permanence of that affirmation is captured by the heart-rending, clarion words of The Partisans' Song written by Herschel Glick, "We are here."

As CJN columnist and educator Rachael Turkienicz teaches regarding certain key messages of Jewish life, we must regard the song and its title as both descriptive and prescriptive.

"We are here" describes, simply, the fact and the permanence of Jewish survival. But it also prescribes the obligation upon us all to take our place in the mainstream of Jewish history.

Faulty reasoning in editorial

Your Oct. 22 editorial ("The old hatred is deforming the world") is notable for its inflammatory rhetoric and faulty reasoning. No doubt Israel has lots of enemies who are happy to exploit any problems that Israel faces, but it wouldn't hurt for us Canadian Jews to acknowledge once in a while that some of Israel's problems are of its own making. Never once in the discussion of the Goldstone report have you even considered the possibility (if only to reject it) that Israel overreacted in Gaza. What makes you so sure that the Israel Defence Forces didn't commit any crimes? Most military operations involve unnecessary violence against civilians. Your only "evidence" seems to be that an attack on Israel's conduct must, by definition, be based on anti-Semitism. This sort of mindless argumentation is not conducive to improving the situation in the Middle East.

Anti-Semitism growing

It is time for Jews to wake up. Israel and Jews have missed golden opportunities to counter the lies that are written about us. It is time for a world gathering of Jews to discuss how to fight the Arab propaganda that is the main cause of anti-Semitism, how to respond to the lies and false accusations that Hamas and Hezbollah feed to the United Nations and to the press, and how to beat them at their own game with the truth and to expose their lies. We should also establish a central organization to educate the international community with facts, and then people around the world will see who the real occupiers of stolen land are. Time is not on our side. The floodwaters of anti-Semitism keep rising, but there still is time to turn the tide. We owe it to our children and grandchildren to take action.

Grey matter

Sulphur grey, granite grey, asphalt grey, cement grey, ash grey; many, many monuments; all in varying shades of grey and black. Monuments cropping up like grey weeds in a grey cemetery; black stones growing like reeds in a grey walkway – the sad, neutral colours throughout the world where memorial stones, monuments and Holocaust museums abound.

We come to pay homage, we come to pay our respects, we come to place markers so that we remember we were there; our pilgrimage to these cold, menacing, awesome grey stones is our legacy. We pray, we beseech God that this piece of history should never be repeated. We remember; we must never forget.

Too many future generations were annihilated before they even had a chance to be born. They are resurrected by our giving birth to stones and monuments and memorials. So many Yad Vashems, so many buildings housing memorabilia, horror photos, frightening captions and impossible numbers, unbelievable numbers. So many numbers of people erased from the earth. We carry grey sacks of grey ashes on our backs, in our psyches. And when we're weary, we pass these sacks on to future generations. We must. We must. Build up new generations of scholars, scientists, doctors, musicians, writers, artists, composers, leaders, teachers – for the benefit of all peoples.

Our legacy is grey and black. Our future, however, must be bright. Must be colourful, must be productive. That, too, is our legacy.

'Palestine' and Israeli maps

In his "Rejoinder to Crook and Marcus," (letters, Oct. 29), Stephen Scheinberg complains that Israeli maps do not show "Palestine." There's a very simple reason for that. "Palestine" does not exist. Its borders have been the subject of negotiation since 1993, and the delay in its creation can be attributed almost entirely to Palestinian terrorism and refusal to accept Israel as the Jewish state. Scheinberg goes on to note that many Israel maps do not even show the Green Line, which he erroneously calls "Israel's pre-1967 borders." The Green Line is nothing more than the armistice line where hostilities ended in 1948. The fact that the Arab world has consistently refused to negotiate actual borders with Israel appears to have escaped his notice completely. As Scheinberg seems so keen to compare Israeli and Palestinian sentiments, may I remind him that as Itamar Marcus and Barbara Cook keep demonstrating, the Palestinians celebrate suicide bombers, naming schools and summer camps after them and idolizing them in their mosques. They also call for continued "martyrdom" in their textbooks and official media. That is official Palestinian policy. I challenge Scheinberg to find anything similar in Israel.

The Jewish origins of the Israeli army

By DEREK JONATHAN PENSLAR

In today's world, Jewish valour in combat is associated almost entirely with the State of Israel. Zionism conceived of Diaspora Jews as often passive and timid, and it strove to create a new generation of tough Jewish fighters.

Yet the Israel Defence Forces did not emerge from a vacuum. Before Israel's establishment, Jews had a long history of engagement with the military. They often saw it as something to be feared and avoided at all costs, but there were many situations where Jews had few qualms about military service and going to war. In modern states, Jewish valour was tied to social acceptance: when Jews felt themselves to be part of the body politic, they willingly went forth to defend it.

There have been four kinds of Jewish fighters in the modern Diaspora. The first and most common type is the conscript. Universal male conscription became common in the 1800s. When Jews felt attached to the state or were hopeful that military service would bring them civil rights, they volunteered, even before being conscripted, as in the Prussian wars of liberation against Napoleonic France.

One painful side effect of modern Jewish conscription has been Jews fighting each other as members of combatant armies. During World War I, stories swirled around the eastern front in which a Jew kills an enemy soldier, who, with his last breath, utters the Shema. These stories were told throughout the 1800s, in many wars and places, and it is hard to say if they were ever true or legends fuelled by the Jews' divided feelings of national patriotism and trans-national Jewish solidarity.

The families of most Canadian Jews come from Russia, where the army was dreaded and Jews frequently strove to avoid it. The situation was at its worst in the first half of the 1800s, when Jews faced a gruelling 25-year term of service, and Jewish communities at times filled conscription quotas with poor and orphaned children rather than young men from more prosperous families. From 1874, the term of service was reduced to six years for all of the czar's subjects, including Jews, but the army remained a tough, hostile environment, with no possibility of advancement to officer ranks.

Moritz Daniel Oppenheim, A stylized rendering of Yom Kippur during the Franco-Prussian War, 1870.

Many a Canadian Jew has a relative who, the story goes, left Russia in order to flee the czar's army. Was this the real reason? In recent years, scholars have challenged the importance of the draft – and also of pogroms – as determining Jews' decisions to leave Russia for the New World. Poverty, they say, was the most important factor. Perhaps. But at times, there was a definite connection between the draft and flight from the country, as in the case of a stream of young Jewish men who fled Russia for Palestine and North America at the time of the Russo-Japanese War.

In the eastern Hapsburg Empire and parts of the Ottoman Empire, Jews often did everything possible to flee military service. But so did many other nationalities. In the Hapsburg Empire in the late 1800s, by far the highest draft-dodging rates were in parts of the empire where few Jews lived, such as Croatia or northern Italy. In Galicia and the Carpathians, Jews did dodge the draft in substantial numbers, but Ukrainians and Ruthenians did so as well.

The centrality of the draft-dodging motif in family narratives of North American Jews may be the result of a simple natural selection. Those who wished to flee the czar's army wound up leaving the country, but in fact, two-thirds of Russia's Jews stayed within the empire until the revolution, after which Soviet Jews became citizen-soldiers of a new type, now as guardians of communism in the Red Army.

The second type of modern Jewish fighter is a career officer, of whom there were many in France, Italy and the Hapsburg Empire. Although anti-Semitism ran deep in the French army, so did a commitment to merit, and Jews were welcomed into most branches of the officer corps. The hapless Alfred Dreyfus was but one of hundreds of French-Jewish captains and colonels. Twenty Jewish generals were commanders during the period of the Third Republic. In the late 1800s, French Jews commanded gunboats in the Gulf of Tonkin, led landing parties in Dahomey and supervised fortifications for all of Algeria.

In the kingdom of Italy, Jews were pillars of the state, and given their relative wealth and education, had easy access to the officer corps. Although Italy's Jewish population numbered barely 40,000, between 1859 and 1938, there were 58 Jewish generals and admirals, including the war minister, Giuseppe Ottolenghi, and there were some 700 Jewish officers of all ranks in service in 1895.

German-Jewish men were bitterly frustrated that anti-Semitism kept them from obtaining the coveted rank of reserve officer, especially when in neighbouring Austria-Hungary, Jews were highly overrepresented among reserve officers and many made careers as military judges and administrators.

The third type of Jewish fighter, the revolutionary, entered history as a civil guardsman in France, then in central Europe, in a series of upheavals from 1789 to 1848. Jews streamed into the civil guards because of the promise of equal rights. (They also usually had enough money to purchase the requisite uniform and equipment.) In 1848, Jews mounted the barricades in Paris, Budapest and Berlin. In Berlin, the founder of modern Jewish scholarship, Leopold Zunz, called his brethren to battle, shouting, "By spring, Amalek will be defeated."

A similar spirit motivated Polish Jews who, between 1830 and 1863, fought side by side with their Christian compatriots in a series of failed rebellions against Russian rule. It was here that legions of armed Jews first called themselves Maccabeans and explicitly linked the fortunes of Jews as a collective with those of the nation for which they laid down their lives.

These middle-class types foreshadowed the proletarian Jewish revolutionaries in eastern Europe who emerged in the early 1880s and played such a prominent role in socialist and communist movements up to 1917 and beyond. In the pogroms in Russia of the early 1900s, revolutionary Jewish youth took the lead in forming self-defence squads. Some of the young fighters from the Pale of Settlement and the Crimea came to Palestine, where they founded the first Zionist militia, thus directly linking Diaspora Jewish valour with the early Zionist movement.

The fourth type were the ghetto fighters, camp rebels and partisans of World War II. Many of these fighters figured among the scores of thousands of Holocaust survivors who came to Palestine between 1945 and 1947 and the 20,000 Gachal (meguyasei chutz la'aretz) who were recruited for battle from the end of 1947. Compared to the other types, this group suffered by far the highest levels of trauma, injury and anguish, both physical and psychological. It was the most deeply engaged in fighting and the least connected with the military as an institution or concept. These were not citizens fulfilling national service, nor field officers engaged (as they were until World War I) in mercifully few and brief campaigns, nor guardsmen or revolutionaries whose activities, however intense and dangerous, were short-lived. The ghetto and camp rebels were fighters, not soldiers, operating in a morally unambiguous universe in which there was no alternative to fighting but certain and ignominious death.

At first glance, there is not much connection between these four types and the native-born (or close to native) Palestinian Jews who built up the militias of the Yishuv (pre-1948 Jewish Palestine) during the 1930s and '40s and led the Israel Defence Forces to victory in 1948.

But the infant Israeli army was a hodge-podge of different military models, combining elements of a standing army and a revolutionary militia. There were Haganah leaders in the interwar Yishuv who had cut their fighting teeth in European armies during World War I and the Bolshevik Revolution.

There were those from the Red Army, like Palmach commander Yitzhak Sadeh; or officers in the Hapsburg military, like Sigmund (Edler von) Friedmann, who changed his name to Eitan Avisar and became deputy chief of staff of the Haganah.

The 1948 War of Independence was fought largely by people who grew up in the Yishuv, but they were joined by thousands of newcomers. There were the Gachal, some of whom had served in east European armies in the 1930s.

And the 3,500-strong Machal, the volunteers from South Africa, western Europe and North America, played a major role in the formation of the new state's air force and armoured divisions. Having just finished the long and exhausting battle against Hitler, Jewish veterans of World War II brought their expertise and experience to the young State of Israel. Canadian Jews have a special pride of place in the Machal: on a per capita basis they out-volunteered their American counterparts by a ratio of five to one. And Toronto's own Ben Dunkelman, who was very much at home in both Canada and the Yishuv, commanded the 7th Brigade that captured the Lower Galilee for Israel.

Israel has accomplished great and unique things, but no aspect of the country, including its military, is cut off from the Jewish past. Modern Jewry has at times shunned war, at times welcomed it. It has often renounced militaristic values and lifestyles, but it has not rejected the military as such. It has not only accepted the inevitability of "a time for war, a time for peace," but also the responsibility to engage itself with both.

MASA's mission

Most rank-and-file American Jews say they're not in the Diaspora. That's where other non-Israeli Jews live. For them, the United States is their only homeland. Hence the uproar when MASA, a Jewish Agency organization that brings young Jews from abroad to study in Israel, tried to enhance its image among Israeli taxpayers, who foot part of its bill, by publishing ads in which Jews in the Diaspora were described as missing persons – victims of assimilation.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Several American Jewish organizations objected vehemently, and the campaign was aborted. Echoing their outrage, J.J. Goldberg of the Forward newspaper wrote that "a major proportion of self-identified Jews under 25 today have only one Jewish parent." Therefore, he concluded, "the issue in America is no longer how to fight intermarriage. That horse is out of the barn. The question now is how to draw the new Jews to Judaism."

For him, questioning Jewish affiliation by describing such Jews as missing persons is counterproductive. He wrote that young Jews who may only have one Jewish parent won't be moved by "commercials implying that their parents' marriage was a form of genocide."

But writing in the same paper, Jack Wertheimer, professor of American Jewish history at the Jewish Theological Seminary, was less critical: "While the ad may have been clumsy in its execution, its central point is essentially correct: Large numbers of Jews around the world are disconnected from any Jewish communal activities." He observes that "the majority of intermarried families raise their children in a faith other than Judaism or in two faiths or no faith at all; not surprisingly, when they reach adulthood, most of these offspring do not identify as Jews."

Prof. Jonathan Sarna, another historian of American Jewry, stresses the growing disenchantment with Israel among the young. Also writing in the Forward, he ascribes it to their refusal to view Israel through the rose-coloured spectacles of their parents: "In place of the utopia that we had hoped Israel might become, young Jews today often view Israel through the eyes of contemporary media: they fixate upon its unloveliest warts." Even when they aren't lost to Judaism, they may be missing as far as Israel is concerned.

In principle, therefore, MASA's mission is warranted. In the current academic year, some 9,200 young Jews from around the world will receive scholarships to enable them to spend three months or more in an accredited study program in Israel.

I hope many young Canadian Jews, who are usually more ready to realistically accept that they live in the Diaspora, will take advantage of the opportunity.

Making our texts relevant again and again

I learned the term rifacimento from that wonderful New York Times wordsmith William Safire, recently deceased. It refers to the re-making of a story, myth or legend under different circumstances from that of the original. I am currently working on a book about Megillat Esther that deals with this very process over several centuries.

Seymour Epstein in Toronto

There was a recent concert that illustrated the rich potential of interpretation in our ancient texts. The Royal Ontario Museum, excited about showing us Dead Sea Scrolls fragments that testify to the rich literary heritage we Jews own and have shared with the world, decided to sponsor a concert together with the Tafelmusik Baroque Orchestra and Chamber Choir. The main event was the music of Christos Hatzis, the talented and inspiring Canadian composer who teaches at the University of Toronto's faculty of music. Hatzis has written an exceptionally beautiful rendition of Psalm 91, a psalm we recite every Shabbat and Yom Tov to prepare us for morning prayers. He has also written music for the Song of Songs (Shir Hashirim), a great chain in the link of compositions that have been created for the verses of this book, which Rabbi Akiva termed the holy of holies.

That music was performed beautifully by Tafelmusik, with the addition of the original Hebrew chanted by Cantor Gershon Silins. It was an excellent concert, designed to demonstrate the influence of ancient biblical texts on Judaism, Christianity and Islam, but it also revealed the profound potential of the biblical text to be reinterpreted by each generation of readers.

First on the program was a Song of Songs composition for choir by Henry Purcell, My Beloved Spake. I noted that Purcell added the word Halleluya to the end of the quoted verses from Song of Songs. Of course, that musical Hebrew word, which exists in most western languages, does not appear in the Song of Songs. It contains God's name, and God does not appear in this particular book of the Bible. (A friend once pointed out that Halleluya in Hebrew is composed of God's name and la, la, la!)

But Purcell must have been as convinced as our rabbis that the Song was about more than mere human, erotic love – that it could also be read as the love between us and the Divine. His addition to the biblical text was no more audacious than many rabbinic interpretations and midrashim that permit us to read sacred literature into our own lives.

Hatzis also interpreted the first verse of Psalm 91 as he wrote the haunting first section of his musical composition. Every Shabbat, we read that "He who dwells in the secreted shelter on high will find protection in the Almighty" and we proceed directly to the next verse, whereas Hatzis was mystified by the "secret" in the verse and composed a whispered secret that returned to haunt us throughout the psalm.

Another example of this textual re-engineering to suit a different time and place was that 1960s version of the third chapter of Kohelet, Turn! Turn! Turn! by the Byrds. It's obvious that the original biblical text is speaking about fated destiny in the hands of God.

"A season is set for everything… a time to be born, a time to die… a time to cry, a time to laugh…" But the song goes: "A time to love, a time to hate/ A time for peace, I swear it's not too late." Some 1960s folk singers read into a biblical poem about fated destiny the hope that we humans could change the world. Not a bad midrash at all, but clearly it was a re-interpretation of an ancient sacred text that fit our hopes and dreams.

Rifacimento is a time-honoured technique that we Jews have practised for millennia in all of the countries we've inhabited across the globe. It demands pride and courage – pride in our rich heritage of classical texts, replete with lessons for all of mankind, and courage to re-interpret those texts in each generation so that they continue to speak a language we can understand.

Remembering the untold stories

One of the most compelling aspects of Holocaust Education Week is the opportunity to hear survivors speak. Our understanding of the Holocaust would be incomplete and impoverished without these important voices.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Lately, however, I've been thinking about the stories we do not hear – stories that are just as integral to the essence of the Shoah, but are inaccessible or inaudible to us. Over the past several months, in the vast archives of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., I have plunged into stories removed from our radar.

There is a treasure trove of diaries, poems, and fiction written during the Holocaust under of impossible circumstances – in hiding, in ghettoes and in labour camps. This writing captures the torments, anxieties, resilience, desperation and hopes to endure, to live out the war years. While much of this writing has been lost, a substantial amount was recovered after the war, opening up a window on those terrible times for those who came later.

But there are no diaries from killing centres such as Sobibor and Treblinka, dreadful places where Jews wefe taken to be murdered, without chance of reprieve. There are no diaries from the killing fields, from the murdered families forced to undress in front of relatives, neighbours and strangers before being gunned down.

Those stories can never be told, except by those at some remove. The Italian writer Primo Levi, who survived slave labour in Auschwitz, has observed that because the Jews who "did not return" would never tell their stories, it was up to the minority who survived to "speak in their stead, by proxy." Survivors are the closest witnesses to those who did not escape the genocidal net. Their voices help keep the lives and deaths of the murder victims from fading into oblivion. At the same time, Levi and others acknowledge that the living cannot fully represent the voices of the dead, whose stories cannot be wholly known to us.

The Yiddish poet Abraham (Avrom) Sutzkever's 1946 Poem About a Herring imagines such a horrific murder site by focusing on a mother and her child at the edge of a charnel pit. Because the child is hungry, and the mother is a mother, even at the edge of death, she feeds him a herring that she had thought to pack, not knowing where they would be taken. Sutzkever, who was in the Vilna Ghetto for two years, composed more than 80 poems during the Holocaust. Here he attempts to bear witness by imagining the experience of the murdered Jews, gunned down brutally and coldly. As the body of the "child with a bloody herring in his mouth" falls into the pit where he will be buried, the poem reluctantly acknowledges the limitations of the living to speak for dead, as the poet searches "for that herring's salt/and still cannot/find its taste on my lips."

Several years ago, a professor of classics at an American university began to trace the fate of his great-uncle who, unlike his own grandfather, did not come to settle in North America. The resulting book, Dan Mendelsohn's The Lost, uncovers and attempts to imagine the lives, and finally, the brutal deaths, of his great-uncle's family. He reminds us not only of the insupportable loss of life, but also of the deliberate and perverse torment of victims before their murder. Mendelsohn's lost relatives come to stand for the vast number of people whose lives and deaths fall outside of the stories we most often hear and tell about the Holocaust.

I have listened to scratchy voices of testimonies recorded on magnetic tape during the first year or so after the war. These tapes capture the hopeful determination of war refugees to rebuild their shattered lives. But they also reveal the inner and outer chaos of that time, the deep bereavements, the still-fresh shock of what had been witnessed and endured.

Some of the stories I encounter in the archives rarely find a place in a public forum. I suspect that they are more than most of us wish to bear. But they constitute the dark centre of the catastrophe we call the Holocaust.

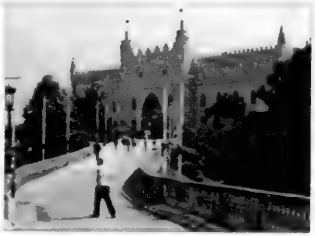
Images of Poland, past and present

Sheldon Kirshner in Poland

If a photograph tells a thousand words, as an old adage suggests, then these photographs surely speak volumes

As I travelled through Poland recently, I was struck by evocative images that speak to its Jewish dimension, past and present, and its triumph over Nazi tyranny during World War II, which broke out 70 years ago in September and changed everything.



Lublin's historic castle, a landmark in this eastern Polish city, is close to the centre of its prewar Jewish community.

Warsaw's historic Old Town, virtually razed by the Nazis, was restored after the war and is now a prime tourist attraction.

This monument pays tribute to the victims of Plaszow, a former Nazi concentration camp in Krakow. Steven Spielberg's film, Schindler's List, unfolded, in part, in Plaszow.

Kazimierz, a mainly Orthodox Jewish enclave in Krakow before the Holocaust, has been reinvented as a Jewish historical, cultural and culinary destination. This Jewish-style restaurant in Kazimierz caters to tourists from Poland and abroad.

Bagels, bagels. A vendor in downtown Krakow waits for customers.

The entrance to the Jewish cemetery in Lodz, Europe's biggest such cemetery. Though it is not in the best condition, it is still in use.

Oskar Schindler's workshops in Krakow are to be converted into a museum.

A frieze in Krakow related to the settlement of Jews in Poland in the Middle Ages shows Jewish merchants petitioning a king for permission to live in the Polish kingdom.

Blown-up photographs of former Jewish inhabitants of Warsaw hang on a worn building in what was once the Nazi ghetto.

These pits in Lodz's Jewish cemetery were ordered dug by the Nazis after they decided to liquidate the ghetto in the summer of 1944. The Jewish workers who were commandeered for the job were to have been shot and buried in them after the ghetto was closed. But with the Red Army advancing on Lodz, the Nazis had no time to kill them.

A photographic exhibition of synagogues no longer used as shuls was mounted at the recent Jewish Cultural Festival in Krakow. This shul somewhere in Poland was turned into a public washroom after the Holocaust and during the Communist era.

Last of a series of stories on Poland.

Guest Voice

We must continue to listen

By KORTNEY SHAPIRO
Special to The CJN

One evening, on the cusp of my 11th birthday, my little-girl naivete escaped, and I approached my grandmother. "Nana Vera, will you tell me about the Holocaust?"

She did not cry, nor did she redirect my question. With the utmost of grace, my grandmother told me of her childhood, about her days growing up in Banska Bystrica, a town of 13,000 in what is today central Slovakia, and of how her blissful days soon became hell on earth. That is when I realized that my grandmother is a survivor.

A number of synonyms are suggested for the word "survivor." The list includes "debris," "scrap" and "leftover." Is it therefore justifiable to label my own grandmother as such? The word "survivor" differs in meaning for everyone; however, I must argue that there is a significant difference between those who have persevered through an awful episode in their lives and a survivor of the Shoah. Between 1939 and 1945, nearly 11 million people were brutally murdered in Europe, and therefore, anyone who was able to escape death during the time of Adolf Hitler's reign is a survivor.

As a third-generation Holocaust survivor, I have realized that not only is the retelling of the individual stories imperative, but listening to these stories is of the utmost importance. As I wrote this piece, I sifted through a Ziploc bag containing cue cards from the many lectures that my grandmother Vera has delivered over the years. I could set aside my values as a writer and merely recite the details of my grandmother's imprisonment and concentration camp experiences, but I will not. What I will do is ask this question: What in fact does it mean to be a Survivor?

I, for one, cannot fathom what my grandmother and her family experienced during the war. To have lived a life of leisure, to have thrived in a town where everyone knew your father's name and where summer weekends were spent at Lake Balaton. To have one day awakened and had it all ripped away from you, without any explanation aside from the fact that you were Jewish.

Many ask what the true definition of a survivor is. For me, my grandmother Vera is a survivor of an event in history that not only annihilated more than six million Jews but also redefined a term so commonly used in our colloquial speech. Survivors endured a dark historical period when man lost his mind and placed his fellow brothers in furnaces to burn them into dust.

Tell me that my grandmother is not a survivor, and I will show you the mountain of human ashes in Majdanek. Tell me that my grandmother is not a survivor when you stand inside a chamber once used to suffocate hundreds of thousands of innocents, with walls stained green from Zyklon B. Tell me that my grandmother, Vera Szüsz Martin Gold, is not a survivor after losing her own mother in a camp, just days after liberation. My grandmother was able to survive, along with her sister and her father, Kornel, for whom I am named.

This year marks Holocaust Education Week's 29th anniversary. In 2006, I travelled to Poland on the March of the Living, an organized trip with my peers. Upon arriving at the Majdanek death camp, we were brought into a small room. We were standing inside hell – a gas chamber once used to kill hundreds of thousands of innocents.

Although I did not see the camps where members of my family were prisoners – Bergen-Belsen, Buchenwald and Ravensbrück, all located in Germany – I was honoured to have read my grandmother's story of survival while standing in a forest clearing that had once been Treblinka, a camp in Poland where only one inmate is rumoured to have survived.

During my final year of high school, I felt the need to bring Holocaust education to life, after coming to terms with the fact that my Jewish high school had yet to have a week dedicated to Shoah awareness to coincide with the city-run events. This year, I am fortunate to have a position in Hillel once again that allows me to advocate to students across the city of Montreal, explaining the importance of Holocaust remembrance, and to have many students come out to our events, including a special Shabbat dinner, where my grandmother will be attending for her third consecutive year.

With the realization that survivors are getting older, many of us are coming to terms with the importance of hearing their testimonials first hand.

"I always talk about this with young readers. [There is this] window of opportunity and it is a window that is slowly closing in on us because it is an aging population, and most of the survivors that I speak to these days are probably in their 80s," author Kathy Kacer says. "The thought that those first-hand accounts of survivors could in fact be gone in a few years to me is so startling, and more than that, it is about their voices being gone."

Kacer, who has written numerous books on the Holocaust shares with me a deep connection to the subject, as both her parents survived the war.

"Actually having the opportunity to sit down with these survivors and talk and hear their voice… that's what becomes so memorable," Kacer says, following with a few words of encouragement to me: "Hopefully, Kortney, one day, you will be the one writing the book."

Continue asking questions. Continue reading the thousands of testimonies. Continue reaching out to those who may not know what you know, for soon the voice of the survivor will be but an echo in our minds, and it is our role as the next generation of world leaders to commit to the retelling of the survivor's story.

My grandmother Vera is my story, and we have only just begun the first half…

Confronting the Holocaust: Moral Lessons from the Shoah

PROFESSOR DAVID R. BLUMENTHAL explores how we can create models that equip youth for compassionate and courageous behaviour. His claim rests on analysis of why some very ordinary people became perpetrators and bystanders while other equally ordinary people became heroes. The concrete lessons he draws apply to schools, families, businesses, professional associations and community organizations.

The past 70 years have demonstrated the continued dangers of state-sanctioned genocide; indifference and inaction in the face of mass atrocities; and the danger of assaults on the innocent. Using both historical examples and contemporary international issues, IRWIN COTLER will explore our collective responsibility to prevent, prosecute and protect.

Jewish Life

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Memorial customs may vary

The woman was expressing what was obviously an annoyance to her. Unfortunately, this was taking place during a burial. Only later did it become known to me that I was the object of her annoyance.

Apparently, after attending a Sephardi funeral, she had even registered her displeasure to the funeral home staff. "Never in her life," she said, has she seen a rabbi commit such a glaring mistake. I was, she said, guilty of omission, as at the end of the funeral I did not recite K'El Maleh Rachamim, the memorial prayer that she was accustomed to hearing.

She was correct in that I had not said this prayer, but she was totally wrong in her thinking that there is but one legitimate way: the Ashkenazi. I should add that she was perhaps even more wrong in the manner in which her perceived grievance found expression.

The fact is that in the Sephardi rite the Maleh prayer is not recited at the conclusion of the funeral – actually it is not said at all! The memorial prayer in the Sephardi rite is called the Hashkavah, the laying down. By virtue alone of this title, one would understand that the appropriate recital of the prayer comes only after burial and not as any part of the funeral service.

The innocent but nevertheless arrogant behaviour of that individual taught me at least two things: how much we must strive to understand and make room for the customs of others, no matter how much they may differ from ours, and how much we as Sephardim should make our customs known to others.

In saying this, I recall attending the burial of a Hungarian Jew. I found myself amazed at the burial prayers being recited, for despite the differences in pronunciation, the Hebrew words were precisely the same as those said by Sephardim! How the Sephardi ritual travelled to that part of the world and was incorporated by these communities is a point of fascination.

The memorial prayer is by no means the only different custom. Customs are just that, and there are many variations.

The inverted first spade full of dirt, the fact that the spade is not passed from one to the other, are not generally part of the Sephardi custom. Post-burial mourners do not pass between their friends who have formed a corridor of comfort. Instead, the mourners stay put, and their friends pass before them offering their comfort.

Black olives are a part of the traditional meal of condolence, in addition to the Ashkenazi custom of the boiled egg and bun. (Supposedly, this is because olives were plentiful in the Mediterranean, but did not exist in eastern Europe.)

Many, but not all, mourners in the Sephardi rite do not eat meat for the seven days of shivah. Also, it just is as acceptable for Sephardi mourners to leave the shivah house to attend services and recite Kaddish as it is to hold services in the home. Black, in keeping with general Mediterranean norms, is worn. In every Sephardi synagogue, there are designated seats where only mourners sit, thus clearly identifying them as such. This is done even on Shabbat.

Sephardim conclude their shivah by directly and immediately visiting the grave, something that they do again at the shloshim and at the anniversary of the death.

Sephardim do not place stones on the grave of their loved ones, but rather light candles.

On the nights prior to the conclusion of the shivah and the shloshim, and again at the conclusion of the first year (and for some at every anniversary thereafter), the bereaved family hosts a memorial seudah.

My father joined Facebook

My father joined Facebook a month ago. A week later, he tried to "friend" me. The oasis of freedom that the world of Facebook once provided has come to an end.

Now I must decide. Do I accept my dad's invitation as a friend – granting him access to my Facebook profile filled with pictures and videos, notes and wall postings – or do I reject his invitation, a decision that may keep him out of my profile but will spark an awkward phone call.

CLASS ACT
By Daniel Held

This dilemma is not new. There are multiple "OMG (oh my God) my mom joined Facebook" groups; a popular website, http://myparentsjoinedfacebook.com, and in July, Time magazine ran an article titled "Oh crap! My parents joined Facebook."

My father's decision to join Facebook was prompted more by curiosity than a concern for my security. For years he's asked me about Facebook – what is it and what do people do on it – and my answers were never satisfactory. So, partially on my urging, he decided to explore.

He's quite right. Facebook boasts 250 million active users. 120 million of whom log in at least once a day. One billion photos are uploaded and 2.4 million events created each month. When I recently needed to reach a student, I was amazed that he replied to a Facebook message before an e-mail. He told me that he's always logged into Facebook – if not on his computer then on his cellphone.

I believe that if parents aren't fluent in the language of Facebook – even if they aren't "friends with their kids" – they will be missing out on a major piece of their children's identity.

I also realize that my perceived oasis of freedom on Facebook is a farce. Employers and college admission counsellors use it to vet potential employees and students, and camp directors have told me that they now view Facebook profiles as a more reliable source of information than references when hiring counsellors.

No matter how one toggles Facebook's privacy settings, there will always be back doors to information. The safety motto, which I adopted years ago, now seems even more relevant: "If I wouldn't want my parents to see it, it shouldn't be on Facebook."

While concern should be raised about privacy and safety on Facebook, we must also recognize the great potential the platform holds for Jewish engagement and identify formation. I am a member of countless Jewish and Israel-focused groups. I have donated to Jewish causes, been invited to Jewish events, and every week I get a Facebook message telling me what time Shabbat starts. Facebook offers a new forum for Jewish identity with a lower bar for engagement and more accessible forms of activism.

But few in our Jewish community have caught on.

Facebook makes its money through targeting ads – carefully matching advertisements to the interests of its users. In July, it opened up more advertising filters, including the ability to target audiences with particular interests, from particular geographic regions, or members of particular Facebook groups.

With these new filters, bloggers have commented on the astounding Facebook "Jewdar" and the ability to be found by the few Jewish organizations that do venture onto Facebook. It's time for our community to jump on the bandwagon, learn about the platform – both its hazards and its potential – and reach out through the world of online networking.

Facebook may be a fad that will fade away within a few years. But at the moment it's a network filled with Jewish activity waiting for mainstream organizations to tap into its potential.

My father, by venturing into Facebook, is ahead of the curve. By creating a profile, seeking out friends and learning about the platform, he is bridging the divide between digital immigrants and natives. As for his friend invitation – at the moment it's sitting in the purgatory of unanswered friend requests that, perhaps someday, I'll answer.

Stepping up to the majors

One short year ago, Jonathan Telch was just another Carleton University student trying to achieve his goals and get a degree. After finishing university, Telch was able to find a job on Parliament Hill.

On Campus
By Justin Dahan

He's currently working as an intern with James Lunney, a Conservative MP from British Columbia, as Lunney's special assistant.

These prestigious paid internships are extremely rare – only 10 people are selected by the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) to receive them each year.

This is the CIC's mission statement, pulled directly from its website: "The CIC is devoted to the promotion of increased understanding between the peoples of Canada and Israel. It is a non-partisan, voluntary, non-profit organization that enjoys the support of Canadians from all walks of life. In seeking to enhance Canada-Israel friendship, the CIC liaises with government, media, business and the academic sector, often submitting briefs and providing background analyses on matters of public policy. In addition, it sponsors seminars, conferences and other types of educational programming in Canada, and organizes study missions to Israel and the Palestinian areas."

Before Telch took the internship working with Lunney, he was president of AEPi, a Jewish fraternity, at Carleton and the University of Ottawa.

He attributes much of his success to what he learned working with AEPi and networking on campus.

"One of the defining moments of my university career was combating anti-Semitism on both of Ottawa's university campuses. As well, it was a great honour to help educate those who were unaware about genocides," Telch said about his tenure in the Jewish fraternity.

Part of the networking Telch took part in involved another past AEPi president, Jonathan Zafrani. Zafrani also held a CIC internship and worked alongside two MPs. Zafrani helped open the door for his fraternity brother Telch. Both of these men have been able to use the experience they gained from the student-run fraternity to help propel them to Parliament Hill. Zafrani is currently spending the year in Israel.

Between the events Telch organized and attended, he was able to strengthen his ties with Israel and with his Jewish heritage.

Current AEPi president Jason Friedman spoke about how it felt to see Telch flourish outside of school. "Having worked closely with him for the fraternity, it's good to see him succeed," he said. "It also shows a lot of our younger members what being involved in AEPi can do professionally. A lot of our members are interested in being involved politically, and Telch is a good role model."

Friedman and the rest of AEPi hope to continue their trend of churning out valuable assets to the Jewish community.

Jewish libraries at your fingertips

Shhh! Can't you see you're in a library?

It's Jewish Book Month, and you're invited to enter some of the most wonderful Jewish libraries in the world. From Princeton to Jerusalem, many Jewish libraries offer online highlights of their permanent collections, usually free of charge. Today, we'll tour some of the best libraries and find out how to visit dozens more.

The Jewish National & University Library at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem has a bilingual website that is home to several special collections. You can examine more than 250 Ancient Maps of Jerusalem from 1486 to the early 20th century. At the Songs We Love to Hear website, you can listen to recordings of Hebrew songs produced before the creation of the State of Israel. And there is Albert Einstein Online, more than 900 digitized manuscripts from the Hebrew University's Albert Einstein Archives, which includes scans of his scientific materials, writings and travel diaries. [bit.ly/jlib01]

Although most historic texts are in Hebrew, Latin or German, you can pore over several English-language books in their entirety, including Pisgah Sight of Palestine by John Williams (1650), William Francis Lynch's Narrative of the United States' Expedition to the River Jordan and the Dead Sea (1849) and Nat Kostakowsk's International Hebrew Wedding Music (1916). [bit.ly/jlib02] In order to view these books, you will need to download and install the DjVu (Get it? Déjà vu?) plug-in. I had more luck viewing these pages on a PC than a Mac.

The Online Books Page lists links to 35,000 free books on the web. I should point out that most of these works are in the public domain and won't replace your next visit to the bookstore. If you do a search, you can narrow things down to Jewish fiction (Hungry Hearts by Anzia Yezierska, 1920) to poetry (Selected Religious Poems of Solomon ibn Gabirol, translated by Israel Zangwill, 1923) to mysticism (Flowing Light: Kabbalistic Mysticism and the Art of Elliot R. Wolfson by Marcia Bennan, 2008) [bit.ly/jlib03]

Unlike most of the libraries mentioned here, the Jewish Virtual Library exists only in cyberspace. The library boasts 8,000 articles and 4,000 photographs and is divided into 13 "wings," including history, women, the Holocaust, maps and biography. The "peace" section includes such documents as the Balfour Declaration, the United Nations Security Council Resolution 242 and the Israeli-Palestinian Interim Agreement (Oslo 2). [bit.ly/jlib05] The library's "Essential Texts" contains quite an eclectic mix. Where else can you find the full text of Theodor Herzl's The Jewish State alongside a full English translation of the Tanach? [bit.ly/jlib06]

Once you are done with those libraries, there are plenty of others waiting for you. Nancy Pressman Levy of the Princeton University Library [bit.ly/jlib07] and Ethan Starr [bit.ly/jlib08] have done an incredible job amassing links to more than 100 other Jewish libraries and archives/research centres in North America, Israel, Europe, Australia and South Africa.

Finally, take a look at Wikisource for original texts such as The War of the Jews by Josephus [bit.ly/jlib10] and Henry Ford's The International Jew: The World's Foremost Problem. [bit.ly/jlib11] And there's Mark Twain's oft-quoted essay, Concerning the Jews. First published by Harper's magazine in its September 1899 issue, you can read the entire 7,000-word article online. I will leave you with one of the more memorable passages. [bit.ly/jlib09]

"The Egyptian, the Babylonian, and the Persian rose, filled the planet with sound and splendor, then faded to dream-stuff and passed... other peoples have sprung up and held their torch high for a time, but it burned out, and they sit in twilight now, or have vanished. The Jew saw them all, beat them all, and is now what he always was, exhibiting no decadence, no infirmities of age, no weakening of his parts, no slowing of his energies, no dulling of his alert and aggressive mind. All things are mortal but the Jew; all other forces pass, but he remains. What is the secret of his immortality?"

Schools have not seen increase in absenteeism

In the event of an outbreak, the school will rely on instructions from Toronto's public health department, executive director Arthur Landa said

Paul Shaviv, director of education at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, which has 1,460 students on two campuses, told The CJN that despite the widely reported H1N1-related death last week of Evan Frustaglio, a previously healthy 13-year-old Torontonian, there hasn't been an increase in calls from concerned parents.

Like the other schools contacted, TanenbaumCHAT has not seen an increase in absenteeism. "Today, we had a Grade 12 conference, and virtually no kids were away," Shaviv said last Wednesday.

He said regular flu shots are being made available to teachers in school, "as we have done annually for a number of years," but he added that "enquiry shows that it is not practical for us to offer teachers H1N1 on site, because most doctors will not be providing the H1N1 shot, because they have to order a minimum of 500 shots, the paperwork is prodigious, the storage conditions are very stringent, and the vaccine has a short shelf life."

Montreal's two largest Jewish day school corporations are following the 40-page guidelines issued by the Quebec education ministry, as well as some additional measures.

Daniel Smajovits, spokesperson for Jewish People's and Peretz Schools (JPPS) and Bialik High School, said information sessions were held for teachers and students, starting at pre-kindergarten, and there is ongoing education.

"JPPS is truly going the extra mile to ensure that everyone understands what to do and what not to do," he said.

All staff and students are being encouraged to get the vaccine.

Dr. Michael Libman, director of the infectious diseases divisions at the McGill University Health Centre and St. Mary's Hospital, is the chair of the JPPS-Bialik health committee. He has spoken to the JPPS staff about H1N1, and the school nurse at Bialik gave a talk to the staff there, based on Libman's information.

In his latest message, Libman "very strongly encouraged" all parents to vaccinate their children.

"There has been a fair bit of fear-mongering about this vaccination program," he wrote. "The risks of severe complications of this year's flu among children are real.

"The great majority of children will have benign illness, but a few will need hospitalization and some of these will die. Every available piece of evidence, and there is a lot, tells us that any risk associated with the vaccine is far lower than the risk of getting the flu.

"Therefore, even though there are bound to be a few unfortunate cases of bad side-effects of the vaccine, the risks of not vaccinating are much more severe."

There are posters and pamphlets in the schools about how to prevent the spread of the virus through hand-washing and properly covering coughing and sneezing. Among younger children, materials from Henry the Hand, a hand-hygiene awareness program created by American physician Will Sawyer and endorsed by the American Medical Association, are being used.

JPPS and Bialik have hand-sanitizer dispensers throughout the school.

"If a child has a fever they are automatically sent home and cannot return before they have been symptom-free for at least 24 hours," Smajovits added.

As of Oct. 28, there had been no confirmed cases of H1N1 at the schools, which have a total of 1,100 students.

JPPS has also relaxed its green policy during the flu pandemic. Disposable plastic cutlery is again being used in the lunch room, Smajovits said, because they offer greater certainty of sterility than metal utensils.

United Talmud Torahs (UTT) and its Herzliah High Schools, when asked about its flu preparedness, shared a copy of a memo sent to parents in September from Herzliah educational director Ellie Grumberg.

The purpose was "to reassure [parents] that the school is taking very seriously its responsibility to maintain a safe environment for all of our students and staff."

Hand-sanitizer dispensers were installed throughout the building and the local CLSCs (centres locaux de services communautaires, or community health centres) were asked to send professionals to speak about flu prevention.

"We are carefully monitoring our absenteeism, as levels of student and staff absenteeism serve as indicators of the spread of the disease," the memo reads.

Parents are also asked to be "extremely vigilant" regarding their children's health. Students who exhibit any two flu-like symptoms should be kept home until they disappear, Grumberg writes. They are requested to tell the school the reason for their children's absence.

UTT and Herzliah have a total enrolment of about 800 students.

At Solomon Schechter Academy, an elementary school, there are not only hand-sanitizer dispensers throughout the building, but automatic soap dispensers have replaced the manual ones in all of the bathrooms, said principal Shimshon Hamerman. This change, made in the summer, allows the children to avoid touching the dispenser.

"We have also written and spoken to our parents to impress upon them the importance of hygiene," he said, and teachers are also reminding the kids to keep their hands clean.

Hamerman is trying to persuade the government to make school staff a priority group for the vaccination program. "Currently, there are no special provisions, but we think that they are working in a high-risk environment."

He has specifically asked the ministry of education to considering setting up a vaccination clinic at a Nov. 10 convention that will be attended by 600 teachers in Jewish schools.

"All of our teachers want [the vaccine]," he said.

So far this school year, "two or three" students have had flu-like symptoms, but there has been no confirmation of H1N1 infection, he said.

Israeli democracy being undermined, rights advocate says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Core democratic values in Israel are under attack, charges the executive director of Israel's oldest and largest human rights organization.

They are being undermined by the diminishing standing of the Supreme Court, the growing acceptance of ultra-nationalist positions and the increasing number of verbal attacks on human rights groups, said Hagai El-Ad of the Association for Civil Rights in Israel (ACRI).

Brought here last week by the New Israel Fund of Canada, he made these comments in an interview prior to delivering a speech at Holy Blossom Temple.

El-Ad, who has headed ACRI since 2008, said the Israeli government has not abided by eight Supreme Court rulings in the past five years.

These cases touch on a wide variety of issues ranging from the route of the security barrier in the West Bank and the rights of migrant workers in Israel to the fortification of Jewish schools near the Gaza Strip and the building of 245 classrooms in east Jerusalem.

Hagai El-Ad

Recently, the president of the Supreme Court, Dorit Beinisch, rebuked the government, declaring that its rulings were not "mere recommendations," but had to be executed "with the necessary speed and efficiency."

El-Ad is also concerned that comments made by prominent Israeli politician Avigdor Lieberman on Israeli Arabs have gained mainstream acceptance.

Before his appointment as foreign minister in Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's government, Lieberman, head of the right-wing Yisrael Beitenu party, called for Israeli Arabs to sign a loyalty oath.

Slamming Lieberman's suggestion, El-Ad said that every Israeli citizen, including Arabs, are entitled to full equality and human rights.

Saying that verbal attacks on human rights organizations have escalated to a point where they now occur on a weekly basis, he cited a case in which a high-ranking official in the ministry of interior unleashed disparaging remarks regarding the position they have taken on migrant workers' rights.

El-Ad ascribed the erosion of democratic values in Israel to Israel's prolonged occupation of the West Bank.

Claiming that the human rights of Palestinians have been denied by Israel for more than 40 years, he accused the Israeli government of blocking their access to justice and sufficient water supplies and impeding their rights of movement.

"The occupation has a poisonous effect on Israeli democracy," he asserted.

To El-Ad, the most "troubling" aspect of Israel's occupation is the unequal two-tier road system forcing Jews and Arabs use different roads. Israel adopted the system in 2000 in the face of Palestinian terrorism.

Nearly two years ago, ACRI submitted a petition to the Supreme Court in which it lashed out against "the discriminatory prohibition on Palestinian movement" on Route 443. Until 2000, when the second Palestinian uprising broke out, Route 443 was a main thoroughfare for 160,000 Palestinians.

ACRI believes that the ban on Palestinian traffic severely violates basic human rights and represents "blatant and systematic discrimination" on the basis of national origin and is in breach of international humanitarian law.

Last year, the Supreme Court issued an interim decision without making any reference to ACRI's arguments.

El-Ad acknowledged that Israeli civilians living in the West Bank are entitled to security, but that the denial of human rights to Palestinians threatens democracy in Israel.

Racism is a problem in Israeli society, but Israel is not a racist state, he said. As he put it, "Israel's core values are values that ACRI embraces."

Nonetheless, racism affects the lives of Israeli Arabs and Ethiopian Jews, among others, El-Ad pointed out.

He cited a few examples.

Schools in Israel have been loath to accept Ethiopian students. Jewish builders have refused to sell homes to Israeli Arabs. Jewish social clubs have barred entry to Arabs.

El-Ad urged Israel to convene an independent panel to investigate allegations that the Israeli armed forces committed war crimes during its invasion of the Gaza Strip last January.

"It would be the right thing to do and is in Israel's best interests."

Israel has a right to defend itself against "a cruel enemy" such as Hamas, but it must be careful not to violate the legal and moral strictures of warfare.

"Israelis expect their army to conduct itself according to to the rules of war."

He called on Jews in the Diaspora to support ACRI's activities and thus help Israelis build a progressive and enlightened society.

ACRI tries to promote human rights by judicial and educational means, through parliamentary intercessions and by engaging the public.

Public funds available to help rebuild community

Trustee says aging infrastructure poses major challenge

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Jewish community of Toronto can make better use of available public funds for infrastructure

That was the message conveyed to an audience of about 50 people at an Oct. 27 information session at Adath Israel Congregation last week convened by James Pasternak, Toronto District School Board trustee for Ward 5 (York Centre)

"One of the greatest challenges the Jewish community is facing is how to renew its aging infrastructure," Pasternak said. "The biggest expense many institutions have, after wages, is the cost of infrastructure maintenance."

Pasternak, who is Jewish, told The CJN that he wanted community members to know that while many of Toronto's synagogues, Jewish communal buildings and schools are aging, there is money out there that can be tapped from various municipal and federal sources.

One of these is the City of Toronto's Better Buildings Partnership program, which provides "financial assistance for energy efficient retrofits and construction of Toronto buildings" according to the program's website.

James Pasternak

The other funding source Pasternak touted was Natural Resource Canada's "ecoEnergy Retrofit Incentive for Buildings" program, which offers up to $250,000 for eligible organizations to "implement energy-saving projects in commercial and institutional buildings."

Two speakers from these programs – Victor da Rosa, project manager for the academic sector of Toronto's partnership program, and Grant Miles from Natural Resources Canada's office of energy efficiency – spoke at last week's event about their funding opportunities.

Bill Chihata, a porfolio manager from Enbridge Gas Distribution, also spoke.

Pasternak noted that most of the finances available through the government programs are "cost-shared" initiatives.

"You have to have a project on the go or 'shovel ready' and also have some funds in hand," he cautioned. "Depending on what you're doing and how you're going about doing it, the government could match up to half [the financing]."

He said organizations can maximize their chances at securing funding if they are implementing "eco" initiatives.

"That's the area where you'll be most likely to tap into funds," Pasternak said.

Asked why he personally organized this event, Pasternak responded that since he was elected in 2006, he has hosted three events geared to informing the Jewish community about programs that could help it.

"Governments at all levels have hundreds of programs that are of great benefit to the communities that they serve. Most [communities] don't know about them," he said.

"The reality is there are opportunities here, and if we don't apply for them, other groups will take them."

Actor got start in deaf children's theatre company

"Talk about bashert," she said, alluding to the rarity of such a synagogue. According to its website, Bene Shalom is the only full-service synagogue serving the deaf Jewish community in the United States. There is at least one other congregation serving deaf Jews, in Los Angeles, Calif.

As an actor, Matlin got her start as a seven-year-old, determined to land the role of Dorothy in The Wizard of Oz in a deaf children's theatre company.

Another turning point came when actor Henry Winkler and his wife Stacey attended one of Matlin's performances there.

Winkler – who achieved stardom as Fonzie on the television show Happy Days – encouraged the 12-year-old to pursue her dreams and later became her friend and mentor.

As a young actor, Matlin lived in the Winklers' pool house for two years, and was married on their front lawn in 1993.

She and her husband, Los Angeles police officer Kevin Grandalski, have four children ranging from 5 to 13 years old, and incorporate elements of both their religions into their home. Both a rabbi and a Catholic priest officiated at their wedding.

"We do have Shabbat dinner when I am in town," Matlin told The CJN. As well, she said, "we observe the holidays and Jewish traditions."

"Judaism doesn't play as large a role in my life as when I grew up. I have to admit that," she said.

Her home has a mezuzah, but no crosses or crucifixes, she said.

"We do have a Christmas tree – and it's pretty," she added.

The roles she has played – starting with Sarah Norman in her first movie Children of a Lesser God, for which she was the youngest winner of an Academy Award for best actress at age 21 – have all been so different that she couldn't name a favourite, she said.

Marlee Matlin at UJA event

When considering whether to accept a role, "I do look at how they portray a deaf person, but more importantly whether I can develop the role... and whether or not the story altogether is good," Matlin said.

Matlin told The CJN she was stunned when a planned speaking engagement of hers was cancelled because she had played a lesbian on the television series The L Word – a role she mentioned among those she enjoyed.

"There are people who go through that every day," she said.

Matlin, who has a gay brother, said that she thinks gay people and deaf people deal with different emotional issues, but as part of a minority, both are looked at differently. People think that "somehow, you live differently, and that we eat and breathe differently and that's not the case at all."

She believes the issue of cochlear implants, which is highly charged in the deaf community, is "more of a personal choice, but in the middle of it there is a political choice and a cultural choice."

"If it works for that individual, great."

However, she added, she would stress that parents raising children with cochlear implants ensure that the youngsters learn both how to speak and how to sign.

"When you take off your cochlear implant at the end of the day, you're still deaf – and part of being deaf is cultural."

Much of Matlin's time now is devoted to motivational speaking. Next week she is scheduled to meet with the United Nations in regard to improving the rights of disabled people worldwide.

Speisman bursary recipient to study Cdn. survivors

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

PhD student Adara Goldberg, the first recipient of the Dr. Stephen Speisman Bursary, said she is grateful for the financial aid that gives her the opportunity to delve further into and contribute to the Canadian Jewish historical narrative.

Earlier this month, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Ontario Jewish Archives awarded Goldberg with a $500 grant in honour of the late Stephen Speisman, who founded the OJA in 1974 and served as its director until 1999.

Speisman died last October at the age of 65.

The bursary – the majority of which was funded by Pardes Shalom Cemetery, where Speisman served as the executive director – was founded to provide financial support to individuals who are working on a thesis, scholarly article or book in the area of Ontario Jewish history, in which records held by the OJA are integral to their work.

Dr. Stephen Speisman

The $500 grant is meant to be used to offset costs while conducting research at the OJA, such as travel expenses, photocopying and off-site retrieval costs.

"I think Jewish history and Canadian Jewish history, although it is widely studied, there are very few who get the opportunity to go as in depth as I'm being given the opportunity to do with my work," said Goldberg, a PhD student at Clark University in Massachusetts.

"Without bursaries and without these grants, for many students in particular, it would be impossible. You're operating on very little, and you're really being driven by a commitment to the work."

Goldberg, who was one of three applicants, added that when Jewish centres offer this kind of support, it only serves to strengthen the Jewish community.

"I'm trying to provide something where families will be able to look back and read about their parents, their grandparents – not only survivors, but Canadian Jews at large. It would be impossible to do without financial support. I'm very grateful."

Goldberg's dissertation titled We Were Called Greenies: Holocaust Survivors in Postwar Canada, will examine the experiences of Holocaust survivors in postwar Canada between 1947 and 1956 from their perspectives and from those who tried to assist them.

"I'm examining the relationships established between individual survivors, and the social service agencies such as JIAS [Jewish Immigrant Aid Services] that came to their aid, as well as relationships built with the lay Jewish community. I'm investigating such relationships, where they existed, and their effects on the adaptation process, whether they helped or impeded the speed of process," Goldberg said.

"I've been conducting quite a bit of research at the OJA over the past two years on survivor adaptations and resettlements in Toronto specifically, as well as the outlying areas."

OJA director Ellen Scheinberg said that the new bursary "really fits nicely into our mandate and into Stephen Speisman's priorities when he was the director of the OJA."

She added that the archives wanted to honour Speisman, who was known in the community for his extensive knowledge of Toronto's Jewish history and wrote The Jews of Toronto: A History to 1937, a winner of the 1980 City of Toronto Book Award.

"We felt this was a fitting tribute. He really put a lot of effort into acquiring records from across the province and preserving them, and we thought this type of bursary would not only pay homage to him but also encourage researchers to tap into our rich records," Scheinberg said.

The selection committee is made up of Scheinberg, CJN columnist and Speisman's widow, Leila Speisman, as well as several academics, including Queen's University professor Gerald Tulchinsky and University of Toronto professor Frank Bialystok.

She said that the bursary has garnered funds to distribute grants for the next 12 years. An application form can be found online at www.ontariojewisharchives.org under programs.

Meanwhile, Goldberg is currently immersed in her research, trying to track down information about individuals who survived the war and still practised Orthodox Judaism when they resettled in Canada.

"There is so little known about them, and I'm still looking for people," she said.

Anyone interested in getting in touch with Goldberg to offer testimony and assist in her research can contact her at adgoldberg@clarku.edu.

Prof's rebuttal highlights Goldstone's flaws

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The Goldstone report, which accused Israel of war crimes during last winter's Gaza conflict, has been working its way through the United Nations, and the General Assembly was set to debate it on Nov. 4.

The controversial report's flaws were succinctly highlighted in "Goldstone report undermines faith in international law" (Toronto Star, Oct. 21), by University of Toronto law professor Ed Morgan.

Morgan explained how the report's author, South African judge Richard Goldstone, failed to maintain proper standards of evidence in arriving at the grave charge that Israel deliberately targeted and killed Palestinian civilians.

Morgan, an expert in international law, provided an important retort to Star columnist Haroon Siddiqui, who (as noted in last week's column) has accepted, without question, all of the report's allegations against Israel.

As Morgan pointed out time and again, Goldstone's "fact-finding" mission in Gaza dealt with the facts in a highly partial manner. It either took Palestinian testimony against Israel at face value – Goldstone has since admitted that such testimony would not be convincing in a court of law – or failed to find evidence, readily available from Palestinian sources, that would have weighed in Israel's defence.

For example, Morgan noted that the mission said it could find no evidence that Gaza's Islamic University, which was struck by Israeli fire, had been used "as a military facility."

On the contrary, Morgan wrote, such evidence was abundant: "The Islamic University was previously featured as the site of clashes between Fatah and Hamas gunmen, with Fatah soldiers identifying it as a weapons laboratory for the new and improved Qassam rockets that Hamas fires by the thousands into Israel. Palestinian Authority television had a full display of the weapons cache found in the Islamic University at the time."

Goldstone turned a virtual blind eye to Hamas' deliberate policy of using civilians as human shields in order to fire rockets at Israeli civilian centres. Morgan noted that Goldstone even ignored the declaration of Hamas spokesman Fathi Hammad: "This is why [we] have formed human shields of the women, the children, the elderly, the mujahideen, in order to challenge the Zionist bombing machine."

To be sure, Israelis are not indifferent or callous about the loss of innocent Palestinian lives, but they also know, contra the Goldstone report, that the overwhelming responsibility lies with Hamas for having intentionally put its own people in harm's way.

Israeli officials argue that international law, and specifically the rules of war, need to catch up with the reality of conflict posed by groups such as Hamas that hide among civilians. By failing to acknowledge this reality, and by gathering evidence in a biased manner that played into Hamas' hands, Goldstone, Morgan concluded, not only damaged his own reputation, he also inflicted damage on international law.

* * * *

In an interview with Newsweek writer Lally Weymouth ("Peace Out of Necessity" Oct. 23), Israeli president Shimon Peres said: "I think [the Goldstone report is] a great victory for terror. Never before did any terrorist organization gain such recognition, in the most unfair way…

"First of all, we have a problem in the United Nations: there is a built-in majority against Israel. Israel doesn't stand a chance to win any single issue, because the Muslim and the Arab nations and the ones who follow them are a majority. I think Mr. Goldstone made a mistake by agreeing to preside over a committee which has an anti-Israeli majority – it cannot be objective if the judges are not objective. And the terms of reference were one-sided: to investigate the war crimes of Israel. And the conclusions – they're one sided. There are 26 recommendations. Not one deals with terror. The terrorists are flying free and high. It's unbelievable. Israel does not occupy Gaza. We left Gaza completely. We are the only country that forced our own settlers and army without any foreign pressure to leave Gaza. And for eight years we restrained [while they fired missiles]. No reference to it."

Tel Aviv's 100th anniversary celebrated at concert

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A recent multicultural concert celebrating Tel Aviv's 100th anniversary and 60 years of friendship between Israel and Canada drew an audience of more than 500 people from diverse backgrounds.

The second annual concert, on Oct. 21 at the Pantages Theatre in Winnipeg, was organized by the Manitoba-Israel Shared Values Roundtable [MISVR], which is led, and was founded, by provincial minister of water stewardship, Christine Melnick.

The concert opened with a spectacular performance by the Wushu Manitoba Training Centre, which performed a Chinese dance that is reserved for special occasions. Audience members were clearly delighted by the costumed dancers who joined together to form a four-foot dragon that walked through the audience.

This group was followed by an aboriginal group, the Walking Wolf Dancers, which performed a dance, associated with promoting healing and wholeness, with hula hoops. Many aboriginal supporters of the State of Israel, from places such as The Pas in northern Manitoba, attended the concert.

Following entertainment by the Rozmai Ukranian Dance Company, Rachel Manelson, director of the Tel Aviv Foundation for Europe, the United Kingdom and Canada, told the crowd, "The horahs that Ashkenazi Jews dance were derived from Ukranian and Russian circle dances similar to the ones you just saw."

Manelson arrived with the mayor of Tel Aviv, Ron Huldai, a former combat pilot and kibbutznik whose parents immigrated to Israel in the 1920s.

After saying he was "proud to be the mayor of a dynamic city that is tolerant and open," Huldai joined Israeli singer Hila Eytan on stage as audience members were invited to come up to dance. Enthusiastic adults and teens from a variety of ethnic backgrounds filled the stage and danced a rousing round of horahs.

Following intermission, the audience was treated to a performance by the Caribbean, reggae and soca music group Rockalypso. Then student Cella Lao, a powerful singer who attends the city's Balmoral Hall High School, performed two songs in Italian.

The outstanding troupe of drummers and dancers in Viva Capoeira performed a high-energy Brazilian dance, which was originally created by slaves to camouflage their then-illegal practice of martial arts by turning it into a dance.

Earl Barish, chairman of the executive board of B'nai Brith Canada, was presented with a plaque in honour of the 100th anniversary of the B'nai Brith Manitoba region.

The last performance was by the Sara Sommer Chai Folk Ensemble, North America's oldest and largest Israeli folk dance ensemble.

At the concert were Sharon Blady, MLA for Kirkfield Park; Jonathon Kroft, president of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg; Mel Lazareck, president of the JNF-Prairie region; Marra Messinger, of the Canadian Committee for the Tel Aviv Foundation, and Pamela Rebello, executive director of the India School of Dance. They introduced the various performers.

Princess Adenrele Adeniran-Ogunsanya, from Lagos state, Nigeria, who attended the event while she happened to be in the city said, "It was a great evening. I have never been to Israel, but maybe I will go."

Israeli singer Hila Eytan knows how to engage an audience. Please see related story, page 31

Tel Aviv, Montreal mayors toast their friendship

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — To its mayor, Tel Aviv is more than a city, or even Israel's metropolis and commercial and cultural hub.

"Tel Aviv has a special role in defining the State of Israel. It is very important to me that it represents democracy, tolerance and pluralism, that it is a home for every minority and open to exchanging ideas with the world," said Ron Huldai, who has been mayor since 1998.

He was in Montreal last month as part of the celebration of Tel Aviv's centenary. Montreal Mayor Gerald Tremblay was at his side during a reception hosted by the Canadian Committee for the Tel Aviv Foundation, held at the Mount Stephen Club.

Tremblay, who was in the midst of an election campaign, took part in a toast to friendship between Montreal and Tel Aviv, and said he welcomed partnerships in the arts and cultural spheres. He promised to visit the Israeli city.

He offered to take Huldai on a tour of the developing Quartier des spectacles, the entertainment district in the eastern section of downtown, the next day.

Israeli vice-consul Avi Lev-Louis said the two cities share similarities in their diversity and lively cultural scenes. "They both have joie de vivre, they are cities that never sleep," he said.

Montreal Mayor Gérald Tremblay, right, applauds his Tel Aviv counterpart Ron Huldai at an event celebrating the Israeli city's 100th anniversary.

Lev-Louis mentioned the first-ever performance by the Les Grands Ballets Canadiens de Montréal in June in Tel Aviv as well as Jerusalem, and the sold-out concert by Montreal-born singer Leonard Cohen at Ramat Gan Stadium in suburban Tel Aviv in September as recent points of artistic contact.

Huldai did not make any direct reference to the controversy aroused by the showcasing of Tel Aviv at the Toronto International Film Festival in September.

He did say that his administration last year invested in Tel Aviv's Arab Jaffa section 100 times as much as had been spent in the previous 10 years. He also described the city as one where the gay community and foreign workers can live comfortably.

"We are always looking for tzuris; we are always saying, 'Oy vey,' but the founders of Tel Aviv could never believe that in 100 years, I would be the mayor of a big metropolis in the independent state of the Jews," Huldai said.

The evening was co-chaired by Côte St. Luc city councillor Dida Berku and Bracha Chetrit Tritt, a native of Tel Aviv.

Huldai was born in Israel in 1944 to parents who came in the '20s from Lodz, Poland, and he grew up on a kibbutz. He is a former fighter pilot, who served in the Israel Air Force for 26 years, rising to the rank of brigadier-general. Before going into politics (he is aligned with the Labour party), he was a high school principal.

When the state was proclaimed in 1948, he remembers being a 3-1/2-year-old evacuated from the kibbutz to Tel Aviv, where it was believed he would be safer.

The Tel Aviv Foundation is under the mayor's office, and Huldai serves as its international chair. It was established 32 years ago to raise money for educational, cultural, recreational, social service and environmental projects in the city, especially those that benefit the disadvantaged. About 300 projects have been created over its history.

Every dollar raised for the foundation privately is matched by the municipality. The Canadian committee for the foundation is a registered charity, based in Toronto.

Berku mentioned one other connection between Montreal and Tel Aviv. The hugely successful Bixi, the city-wide bicycle rental system introduced in Montreal this year, was entirely conceived, designed and built in Quebec, she said, except for one important part: the patent on the locking system is Israeli.

Tremblay urged Huldai to join London, which has ordered 6,000 Bixis, and Boston, 2,500 of them, and introduce the environmentally friendly mode of transportation to Tel Aviv as well.

Tremblay, who was introduced by Berku as "a great friend of the Jewish community," had met Huldai once before in 2005 when the Université du Québec à Montréal hosted an exhibition on the architecture of Tel Aviv's "White City," which is a UNESCO world heritage site.

"Jewish values are Montreal and Quebec values, and that is why we have one of the most important Jewish communities in the world," declared Tremblay, who received a warm response from the audience.

Joint project to build playground in Jaffa

By RHONDA SPIVAK

WINNIPEG — A children's playground in the crowded Ajami neighbourhood in Jaffa, Israel, is in the planning, as the result of a joint Manitoba-Tel Aviv effort.

The project was announced here at a special reception attended by Tel Aviv Mayor Ron Huldai and more than 200 guests from a variety of ethnic backgrounds.

The Manitoba-Israel Shared Values Roundtable (MISVR), led by Manitoba Minister of Water Stewardship Christine Melnick, will partner with the Tel Aviv Foundation to build the park, whose estimated cost is $200,000 (US). It is envisioned as a place where Jewish, Muslim and Christian children who live in low-income neighbourhoods of Jaffa can play side-by-side in a peaceful atmosphere. It will be both environmentally friendly and fully accessible.

Huldai told The CJN that the idea of the park is to promote peaceful coexistence between the residents of Jaffa and nurture a sense of shared community. The project is being launched as part of this year's centennial celebrations of the city of Tel Aviv-Jaffa.

"There are about 60,000 residents of Jaffa, about 40,000 Jews and 20,000 Arabs. Over the last 11 years since I have been mayor of Tel Aviv-Jaffa, I have invested over one billion shekels, just in Jaffa alone, for improvements to the sewage system, for electricity, as well as kindergartens, schools and parks," Huldai said.

The crowded, mixed Arab-Jewish neighbourhood of Ajami was the first Jaffa neighbourhood built outside the old city walls.

At the reception, Melnick said the purpose of the MISVR is to strengthen the relationship between Manitobans and Israelis, who value democracy, freedom of speech, public health care and education.

"So far, about $130,000 Cdn has been raised for this park project, and we are in the process of raising the remainder," said Melnick, who hopes to inaugurate the park when she is next in Israel in January 2010 for the Second Annual Manitoba-Israel Water Conference.

She noted that the India School of Dance, Music and Theatre, the Jewish National Fund, the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, B'nai Brith Canada in Winnipeg, the Faith Temple and a devoted group of volunteers, had all helped raise funds for the project.

The park, to be called Playground for Peace, was designed by Moria-Sekely Landscape Architecture. The "plan of the park will encourage a lot of interactive group play," Melnick said.

Rachel Manelson of the Tel Aviv Foundation, who also flew here for the event, said the mandate of the foundation is to enhance the quality of life of residents of Tel Aviv by investing in education, kindergartens, schools and resource centres.

Manitoba-Tel Aviv team up

"The project that the MISVR chose was specifically designed to promote cultural coexistence between all the residents of Ajami and Jaffa generally," Manelson said.

Following the announcement of the project, Israeli singer Eytan entertained while the crowd began dancing horahs, led by an energetic Huldai. The spirited dancing continued until most of the audience, including Winnipeg Mayor Sam Katz, were participating.

Earlier the same day, Huldai met with the new Manitoba Premier Greg Selinger, during Selinger's first day in office.

Former Winnipegger Jackie Simkin, now living in Florida, donated to the park project and flew here to support the event. It was "incredible to see so many people of different backgrounds participating in a celebration of Israel," Simkin said.

The event, held at the Manitoban-Indian Cultural Centre, included a dance performance by the India School of Dance.

BRING WISDOM TO LIFE

Montrealer denied life insurance to travel to Israel

Policy rejected on grounds lawyer visiting 'occupied territory'

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The local society of Jewish lawyers and jurists last week was seeking to resolve why one of its members was denied his first-ever life insurance policy offered as a group plan to members of the Quebec bar at preferred rates – on the grounds that he travels to Israel's "occupied territory."

The territory in question is Holon part of Israel proper.

Dan Goldstein sent relevant documentation to the Lord Reading Law Society after he was notified in September that his application for life and long-term disability insurance was turned down by Medavie Blue Cross.

He was informed that he was turned down because of his "travels to Israel, specifically to the city of Holon."

Lord Reading president Irwin Rudick told The CJN that it has struck a committee to investigate the matter.

"This has very much upset me," Goldstein, a 35-year-old labour lawyer with the firm of Schneider & Gaggino, told The CJN. "I remain uninsured."

On Sept. 21, Goldstein received a letter from the insurance brokerage firm of Michel Rhéaume & Associés Ltée, notifying him only that he was being denied coverage by Medavie Blue Cross for "other reasons (other than medical)," based on the criteria of "risks" determined by the company.

Michel Rhéaume & Associés recommends and is authorized to sell Blue Cross' group plan, but it is Medavie Blue Cross the actual insurer – that approves or rejects individual applications.

When Goldstein then sent a follow-up letter seeking more specific reasons for being turned down, he was told in an Oct. 6 reply that it was because he travels to Holon.

According to Jean-Pierre Carbonneau, an adviser on group insurance for Medavie Blue Cross, Goldstein, when asked where he travels as part of his general insurance evaluation, mentioned Israel and Holon, a town of 170,000 within the Tel Aviv district, where his wife Liat's grandparents reside. Goldstein and his wife travel there annually to visit them and his parents in Jerusalem.

It is a question of "underwriting standards," was Carbonneau's explanation to The CJN. "Mr. Goldstein does travel to [Holon] an occupied territory in Israel… the territory is recognized as dangerous territory."

When informed that Holon is part of Israel proper, Carbonneau said he would pass the information on to company underwriters "and they can double check that."

Asked why Goldstein could not have been issued an individual policy with an "exclusion" clause that would deny benefits in the event of a terrorist incident or war, Carbonneau answered: "My specialty is group policy, so when it comes down to writing an individual policy, I'm not the best-informed person.

"Why is there not an exclusion to the effect that if something happens there, nothing will be paid? I don't know."

Goldstein laughed over the phone when informed of all this, noting that "nothing, absolutely nothing, happens in Holon," which lies on the coastal strip just south of Tel Aviv and is not known to have ever been targeted by terrorists or seen warfare.

In an earlier e-mail to The CJN, Goldstein said: "There has never been a terror attack in Holon, and I don't know of a single Canadian tourist dying in Israel since 1990 [when Marnie Kimmelman, a 17-year-old from Toronto, died in a terrorist explosion on a Tel Aviv beach]."

Goldstein speculated that Medavie Blue Cross could be confusing Holon with Hebron, which is located in the West Bank. Both place names begin with the letter H, have two syllables, and end in "o-n."

A mix-up of the names, he suggested, would be a more plausible explanation for what happened, but would still require a reversal of the decision.

Lord Reading's Rudick said he was not aware at this point of any other lawyer who has similarly been turned down under the Medavie Blue Cross group plan for life insurance because of a perceived risk in visiting Israel. The committee looking into the matter was struck at Lord Reading's last board meeting on Oct. 15.

"We should hear something by the end of this month or the beginning of next to at least ascertain what the facts are and what course of action is being recommended," Rudick said. "This is the first time we've heard of a situation like that. Is this an 'Israel problem' or more than that? I don't know.

"Some of us mused aloud about whether there would be a similar problem if other lawyers travelled to, say, Afghanistan. We are definitely looking into this – no question."

Saint John shul shows off 'new' smaller building

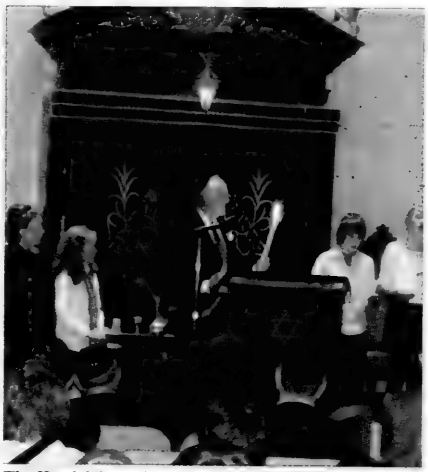
By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — A new synagogue building is bringing a new feeling of confidence that the small Saint John, N.B., Jewish community will grow again and prosper.

These were the passionate feelings of Shaarei Zedek Congregation president, Norman Hamburg, as he described the positive impact that a move to a revamped funeral home on Leinster Street will have on a community with 30 families, only half of whom are fully Jewish, but whose enthusiasm contributes to regular Friday night and Saturday morning services.

A year ago, with costs rising and member numbers dwindling, the congregation's old building on Carleton Street, bought from a church community almost a century ago, was sold to the city for development. After finding the new location, following an extensive search for something of a proper size, Hamburg said the "new" building's renovation is now complete.

"Services were held here for a few months, even as the building was being refurbished into a sanctuary and very popular and well-developed Saint John Historical Museum site," Hamburg, a retired retailer, said. "The museum was active all summer for visitors from the general community and Jewish travellers on the many cruise ships that called on the Port of Saint John."



The Havdalah service began the evening. As well as representing the change from Shabbat to the weekday, it marked the transfer from the old shul of 90 years to the new location.

The official congregational dedication occurred during the post-High Holiday period. But on the evening of Saturday, Oct. 24, lay leaders from the wider community – government representatives who assisted with funding; clergy from various Saint John denominations in the Muslim, Catholic and Protestant communities, and others from the non-Jewish sector joined congregants to celebrate a mini-Havdalah service. It was a time for Shaarei Zedek to show off its new facilities to the wider community. A video of Saint John's rich Jewish history was shown from a new ceiling-mounted projector.

"By last Saturday night, we were ready to show off what we've developed in a smaller space than our old building, which was becoming much too large for our dwindling numbers, much harder to justify with the increasing costs of operation."

The old building was sold to the city more than a year ago for downtown development. The sale and move to a former funeral home on Leinster Street became necessary as the congregation, which numbered about 1,400 in post-peak immigration times from 1920 and through the 1950s, dwindled to 28 families today after out-migration to larger centres.

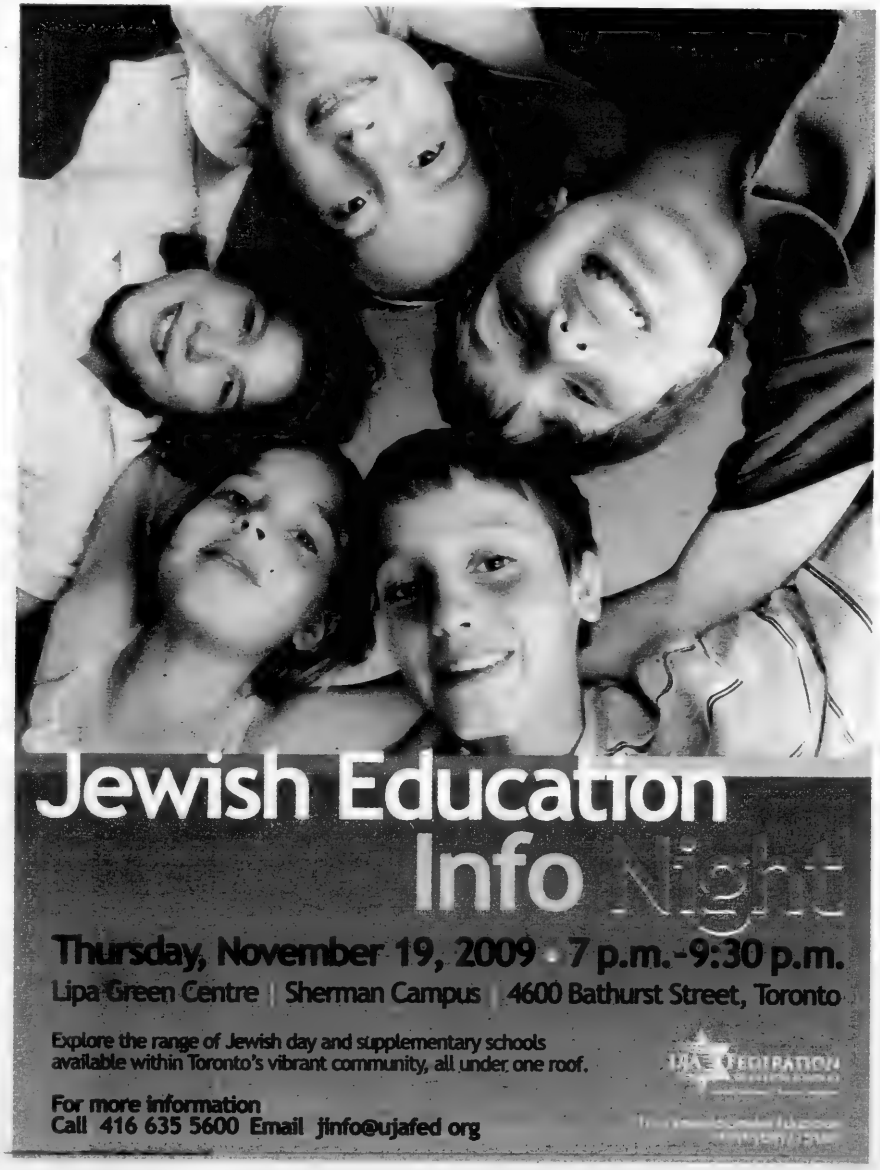
"We've had increased attendance in the last couple of months," Hamburg said, lauding his congregation's efforts to attract younger families and members.

"Our focus has been to sell ourselves to those we don't see often or at all," he said. "It's a chance to develop new programs, aside from the religious part we traditionally provide. If we can appeal to the Jewishness of people, even if they're non-religious, that's OK. If we're offering educational programs and Jewish-themed movies and social events that will bring them a feeling of community within the new building, we'll continue to thrive."

The new two-floor building has a sanctuary on the main floor, with the museum in an adjacent section. The upstairs has three rooms, plus a kitchen, that will be used for social events. It's virtually finished now, Hamburg said.

"There's a new optimism in our community. Our congregants love the new shul. We've combined the old and the new, put it into a sanctuary that holds 100 people and is warmer and cozier. It just feels right to us."

He concluded, "We really have about 15 active families, but even during the winter when many people go south, we can have services for 15 to 30 people on Friday nights and 10 to 20 on Saturday."



CJC defends Web hate section of rights act

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish Congress appeared before a House of Commons committee last week to defend the section of the Canadian Human Rights Act that deals with telephone and Internet hate messages.

Speaking Oct. 27 to the standing committee on justice and human rights, Congress testified on the merits of Section 13, with CEO Bernie Farber calling it "constitutionally appropriate in a free and democratic society, because it deals only with dangerous and harmful speech, and is not concerned simply with offensive speech."

Mark Freiman

Section 13 "empowers the [Canadian Human Rights] Commission to deal with complaints regarding the communication of hate messages by telephone or on the Internet," according to the commission's website.

The standing committee's ongoing study of the usefulness of Section 13 has also heard from those who argue it should be repealed on the grounds it limits freedom of speech and that Canada's Criminal Code already provides protection from hate speech.

Congress president Mark Freiman – a lawyer and former deputy attorney general of Ontario – argued that the provisions in the Criminal Code aren't sufficient to protect individuals or groups from speech that seeks to "demonize" them.

"The target of criminal prosecution is the wrongdoer. And appropriately, we set the highest standards to prevent the horror of an unjust conviction or penalization," he said. "The focus of the Human Rights Act is the message itself, not the wrongdoer. Its purpose is to protect society from the baleful consequences of those messages [of demonization]. That is the appropriate focus."

Expanding on his argument, Freiman specified that Section 13 needs to be in place because of its preventive nature.

"Is hate speech dangerous? To ask the question is to answer it. History provides the clearest examples of the mortal dangers to life that hate speech can carry. Study Nazi propaganda… Cambodian propaganda, anti-Tutsi propaganda… you will get the answers," he said.

Freiman added: "Section 13.1 targets dangerous speech. It targets speech that demonizes individuals on the basis of their affiliation to a group. Demonization is the key, not incitement to violence, because demonization is the necessary precursor, in every case, for subsequent violence. And if society wishes to protect itself against the horrors of genocide or of violence against individuals based on their minority affiliation, it can't start with incitement to violence, it must start with demonization, the denial of any redeeming merit."

As of last week, the committee had not yet indicated when it planned to conclude its study and release its recommendations.

New head of Ottawa JCC is also a spin teacher

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Soloway Jewish Community Centre (SJCC) has a new president and chief operating officer. Barry Sohn arrived in Ottawa at the end of September from Seattle, where he was executive director of the JCC there for the past eight years.

Originally from New York, where he started his professional career, Sohn spent nine years at the Baltimore JCC and nine years at the JCC in Akron, Ohio. The SJCC had been under the interim direction of Maxine Miska for more than a year.

Barry Sohn

But in addition to extensive experience running JCCs, Sohn has an unusual claim to fame. "I may be the only executive director of a JCC who is a certified spinning instructor," he said.

In fact, it was in this capacity that Sohn met his wife, Laura, while in Akron: she was a student in one of his spinning classes. "She only knew me as the spinning instructor. For the longest time she didn't even know I was the executive director of the centre."

Laura, originally from Costa Rica, is a trained attorney who has been working as a court interpreter. She is also a certified Pilates instructor and a former professional dancer.

Sohn's daughter, Aleeza, is a student at the University of Waterloo and part of the allure of coming to Ottawa was to be closer to her and to family members back in New York. Three younger children in his blended family are in Ottawa with Sohn and his wife.

Fitness is an important goal of Sohn's entire family.

"Part of my style is to be accessible and I do that in a variety of ways. In addition to keeping my door open and my telephone lines available, I will be a very active user of the centre. My family all use the centre as well."

Sohn's experience is a big plus, said SJCC chair Arnie Vered.

"The SJCC board and staff are very excited to have Barry on board," Vered said.

"There is no learning curve for Barry… he has already made great impressions with members and community leaders in less than a month on the job."

Indeed, Sohn has hit the ground running.

"My impressions of the centre so far are really very positive," he said. "I don't think people in Ottawa realize how much is happening here… culture, seniors programs, adult Jewish education, partnerships with different organizations that are housed at the centre. I love this campus model. It creates so much synergy among organizations."

Sohn said he's excited by the challenge of making the SJCC even better.

"The centre is very well positioned to be the centre of Jewish life in Ottawa. My goal is to look at what we are doing now at a very good level and really strive for excellence – to ramp everything up just a bit. Part of that is to make sure we are responsive to member needs and the needs of the community… Facilitating leadership is also one of my goals, to cultivate and educate our volunteers to become communal leaders. That will not only strengthen the centre, but also the community."

CIC conference probes Iranian threat

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The situation in Iran must be seen as a clear and immediate danger not only to Israel and the Middle East but to the entire world.

That was the theme that permeated the presentations at an Oct. 27 conference organized by the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) "Democracy in Action: Crisis in Iran" that took place in Gatineau, Quebec. More than 200 people from across Canada – including 50 students from every province, several expatriate Iranians, both Christian and Muslim, and Canadians from other faith communities – assembled to address the threat posed by Iran.

"Ahmadinejad's Iran, which must be distinguished from the people of Iran, has emerged as a clear and present danger not only to Israel, but to Mideast stability, to international peace and to the Iranian people themselves," said Liberal MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler, referring to Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has repeatedly threatened to destroy Israel.

Irwin Cotler

He said that Iran presents a "toxic convergence of four threats: the nuclear threat, the danger of state-sanctioned incitement to genocide, the danger of terrorism, and human rights violations."

Cotler said Canada must address these threats, and he suggested various methods, including sanctions. "If Canada becomes the first country to focus on the four interrelated threats, it can become a leader internationally," he said.

He had previously introduced the Iran Accountability Act, a private member's bill that would hold Iran to account "for its genocidal incitement, domestic repression and nuclear armament" which was adopted by Parliament by unanimous consent of all parties later in the afternoon.

The idea of sanctions was addressed throughout the conference by a number of speakers. Mark Dubowitz, executive director of the Foundation for Defense of Democracies in Washington, D.C., discussed the power of sanctions, urging Canadians to adopt targeted ones against Iran.

"Iran imports 40 per cent of its gasoline – it has an economic Achilles heel," Dubowitz said.

"Focusing on Iran's Revolutionary Guard must be a priority for the Canadian government… the U.S. government has blacklisted them, and I encourage the Canadian government to do the same," he added. "Canada is an energy superpower [with resources] that other countries covet. Canada should offer these countries a choice: do business with Iran or do business with Canada."

In addition to hearing from various speakers from the Jewish Israeli perspective, including Noam Katz from the Israeli Embassy in Washington and Kenneth Timmerman, executive director of the Foundation for Democracy in Iran, conference participants heard from several Iranian expatriates about their personal experiences with the Iranian regime.

Sayeh Hassan, an Iranian pro-democracy activist and blogger, outlined human rights abuses in the country, saying that "what we have seen in the past few months is nothing new. The Iranian regime has been violating human rights for the past 30 years."

She called for Canadians to support the Iranian people.

"If you want to create real change, you must also focus on regime change. The Islamic regime as a whole has no regard for human rights. If our goal is to help the Iranian people, we must work for regime change," she said.

Former Miss World Canada Nazanin Afshin-Jam – an international human rights activist, singer-songwriter, actor and co-founder of the group Stop Child Executions, whose family escaped from Iran to Canada when she was a year old – also urged Canadians to support regime change in Iran. "Until the Iranian people have freedom, we will not see stability," Afshin-Jam said.

Conference participants were welcomed by Israeli Ambassador Miriam Ziv, and Jason Kenney, minister of citizenship, immigration and multiculturalism, who reminded the audience that Prime Minister Stephen Harper "led the civilized world" in boycotting Ahmadinejad's recent speech at the United Nations and that Harper "stated clearly at the G8 summit that Canada will support whatever actions necessary regarding Iran."

Following the deliberations, delegates took buses to Parliament Hill, where they had individual, one-on-one meetings with more than 100 MPs.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee, said the one-day conference was just the beginning of a concerted effort.

"We are looking at a six-month campaign in which we will undertake multiple initiatives. We had not contemplated outreach to the Muslim and Iranian expat community but, based on [the success of the conference], that will be a focus of future initiatives," he said. "The import and impact of this having been a platform for almost simultaneous engagement of the Jewish and Muslim communities… there was really appreciation and a sense of kinship that emerged. It was a great collateral achievement."

Iowa kosher meat plant gets Canadian connection

Montrealer hopes to resume production soon

Compiled by CJN staff

The new Montreal owner of the kosher meat plant in Postville, Iowa, formerly known as Agriprocessors says he expects to resume beef production within the next few months.

Hershey Friedman, who bought the bankrupt plant in July, told the New York-based Jewish Press that he hopes operations will return to their original level. Right now, production is limited to the slaughter and processing of chickens and some deli meats, he said.

"The first priority is putting the business back in order, which will take time," he said.

Agriprocessors, which was owned by the Rubashkin family of New York, was the largest kosher meat plant in the United States. Its former manager, Shlomo Rubashkin, is currently on trial in South Dakota for numerous charges related to financial wrongdoing and hiring of illegal immigrants and abuse of employees.

Friedman, who has changed the name of the plant to Agri Star Meat and Poultry, said, in response to a question about the indictment of the former owners: "What happened in the past is not only history, it's irrelevant to Agri Star. We are a completely new company with new management, new ideas and new resources, and we're looking positively toward the future.

"We want to be good citizens in the state of Iowa and the city of Postville. We will be treating and paying all our employees properly, fairly and equally."

Among the measures he and his two partners have already taken since assuming control in August are the installation of a human resources department that uses "e-verify" to make sure illegal workers are not hired, and the investment of "millions of dollars" into the plant to upgrade health and safety.

Friedman, who owns a plastic packaging business in Montreal, told the Israel- and New York-based Jewish magazine Mishpacha in July that he believed "whatever the Rubashkin family did or did not do, they were victims of a massive witch hunt."

Friedman defended Agri Star's employment of three members of the Rubashkin family, saying that they were among the hundreds of Agriprocessors employees previously working for the bankruptcy trustee who re-applied for work at Agri Star.

Friedman, who bought Agriprocessors' assets at a court-approved auction, said the U.S. government has no objection to the hiring of the Rubashkin relatives because they are not in management positions.

He made clear that he intends to keep the company in Postville. He described the plant as the only one in the world, outside Israel, that was specifically designed for the slaughter and processing of kosher meat.

He added that Iowa is an ideal location because it is near where ranchers raise Black Angus cattle, which provide a very high quality of beef.

He has no plans to live in Iowa.

Friedman, 59, described himself as Montreal-born, educated at a Satmar chassidic school in his native city and then, after his bar mitzvah, at "Litvishe" yeshivas in Baltimore and Monsey, N.Y. His philanthropy is well known in the Orthodox community.

He said he bought the beleaguered business because it was one of only two glatt kosher producers in America, and he didn't want to see a monopoly result if it went under.

He noted that cholov Yisroel kosher milk is very expensive in Canada, because there's only one such provider.

"We cannot afford this type of problem with glatt kosher meat in America. [Rubashkin products are also sold in Canada.] If you only have one glatt kosher meat supplier, within a couple of years you'll end up paying double what you're paying today," he told the Jewish Press.

Friedman has not returned repeated calls from The CJN for an interview.

הרהורים בעקבות פרס נובל ישראלי

חזון אחרית הימים-יהורם עיריצקי

Israeli singer wows Winnipeg audience

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Israeli singer Hila Eytan certainly knows how to engage an audience.

Her enthusiasm proved to be contagious during two recent performances of popular Israeli songs she gave before a multi-ethnic audience in Winnipeg. It was no accident the audience eagerly began to clap, sing along, and even to get up and dance through much of her show. And Eytan wasn't at all shy about dancing on stage with audience members, too.

"I have been singing all of my life, during school, and then in the army I sang in a band while I was in the Israel Defence Forces from 1990 to 1992. Afterward, I started performing for friends and family. Over the years, I have performed at a lot of happy occasions, such as bar mitzvahs and weddings and company events," said the 37-year-old Eytan, who described her ancestry as "half Polish, half Romanian."

In an interview, Eytan said that her singing career took off when she was discovered more than three years ago by the Tel Aviv Foundation, which solicits donors worldwide to invest in new kindergartens, daycares, schools and resource centres in Tel Aviv-Jaffa.

"I began working with the Tel Aviv Foundation after performing at an event at the home of [Tel Aviv Mayor] Ron Huldai. Huldai himself likes music and plays the flute very well. Now, I regularly perform at events where a new kindergarten, library or daycare is inaugurated, and the donors come to Tel Aviv for a special ceremony event," said Eytan.

Although Eytan knows how to play the piano and guitar, she said, "I really don't use them. It is the singing that I like. I concentrate on my voice. My husband, Ronnie, is my sound man. He sells medical equipment in his day job, but for the last nine years he has done all the sound work in the evenings when I sing."

Eytan's upbeat version of well-known Israeli songs, including Hallelujah, Yesh Li Yom Yom Hag and Ani Noladeti La shalom, along with her strong stage presence, succeeded in getting the audience here relaxed and clapping along.

By the time Eytan belted out Mashiach, Mashiach, most people in the mixed crowd of all ages were out of their seats dancing the horah. Eytan, who clearly enjoys creating a party atmosphere, made sure that the horahs continued until most audience members felt they had gotten a good workout.

"When I perform abroad, I see myself as representing Israel, as a goodwill ambassador, and I want to make people feel happy during the performance," said Eytan.

She encouraged participation by walking through the audience and encouraging people to sing the chorus of popular songs into her microphone – and there were no shortage of volunteers.

Hila Eytan

"My favourite music is the old Israeli folklore songs – old, quiet songs, like Hayu Leilot. I love Naomi Shemer songs, and the songs of Uzi Chitman, but I usually perform songs that will make people want to dance," she said.

Eytan sprinkled her performance with a number of classic slower songs, including beautiful renditions of Yerushalayim Shel Zahav and Oseh Shalom, and some audience members joined hands and swayed side to side.

Eytan said that she likes to sing English songs, but usually when she performs in the Diaspora, she is asked to sing in Hebrew.

So far, Eytan hasn't tried to use the Internet to market her singing performances, "as most of my work comes from word-of-mouth."

She said she doesn't like to be out of Israel for long as her youngest child is only eight years old.

"But I am really excited to be here, because it is my first time being in Canada. Who knows, maybe I'll come back and perform here someday for Yom Ha'atzmaut," she said.

Montreal Y, rabbis reach accord on Shabbat opening

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Three days before the YM-YWHA Ben Weider Jewish Community Centre opened its fitness facilities for the first time on Shabbat, its administration and rabbinical representatives reached an accord intended to meet the rabbis' demand that violation of Jewish precepts be minimized.

The rabbis, however, continue to maintain that they're opposed to Shabbat operations.

The Y agreed not to make available its cardiovascular training equipment, which runs on electricity, during Shabbat, opening only its gyms, pool and weight room as of last Saturday, Oct. 31.

The gyms and weight room were to open from 7:30 a.m., an apparent concession won by the Y, which had originally announced in August that those facilities would be open only from 1 p.m. The pool, however, is "initially" opening only from 1 p.m.

All facilities close at 10 p.m.

The Y and the rabbis also agreed to work together to develop Jewish programming. For the present time, the Y is not offering any organized activities on Shabbat, other than the two synagogues that have held services in the building for years.

"As a result of lengthy discussions with rabbis and consultation with a broad range of interested parties, we have arrived at a common understanding that makes the [Y] more accessible to our community while also enhancing our capacity to offer a broad spectrum of Jewish learning opportunities on Shabbat and throughout the week," the Y said in a press release.

The Y said the Jewish programming is to be implemented soon.

"This collaboration with our rabbis on Jewish programming is a clear indication of our community's unique and cohesive nature," the Y also stated.

The accord was reached between a delegation of rabbis who lead modern or mainstream Orthodox congregations.

The Montreal Board of Rabbis, which describes itself as representing "the cross-section of religious movements" within the Montreal Jewish community, simultaneously issued its own statement.

It continues to object to the Y's opening on Shabbat, but said it welcomes "the dialogue that has begun" with the Y regarding the issue of Shabbat opening. The board does not explicitly endorse the trade-off between the rabbinical representatives and the Y on the terms of Shabbat operations, but makes note of the agreement to keep electrically controlled exercise equipment closed

"The dialogue between rabbis and the [Y's] leadership preserves the unity of the Montreal Jewish community, promotes respect for Shabbat, and facilitates a partnership for enhanced Jewish programming at the [Y]," the board stated.

The board is advising all Montreal Jews to consult with their own rabbi regarding the details of Shabbat observance.

It describes the series of meetings in recent weeks between rabbis and members of the Y board of directors, facilitated by Federation CJA, as "productive."

"This engagement reflects a mutual desire to work toward ensuring that the [Y's] programming on Shabbat accords respect to the central Jewish value of Shabbat," it reads.

An ad hoc committee of rabbis, Y board members and others is to be formed to address any issues related to Shabbat opening that come up, as well as develop Jewish programming.

The board's president is Rabbi Adam Scheier of the Orthodox congregation Shaar Hashomayim, who has taken part in the discussions with the Y.

The Rabbinical Council of Canada, Montreal section, an association of some 35 Orthodox synagogues and institutions in the city, also continues to object to the Y's decision to open on Shabbat.

The RCC, however, will work with the Y in developing Jewish programming, it said in a statement.

"The RCC commends the individual rabbis who have engaged the [Y's] leadership in discussion to respect and minimize the extent of chillul Shabbos [desecration of Shabbat]. The RCC also recognizes the Y's effort in taking a step forward by keeping the cardio centre, with its electrical equipment, closed on Shabbat," it stated.

The RCC also approves of the Y's keeping its registration desk and restaurant, which was part of the resolution passed by the Y's boards of directors and trustees in August, as well as assurances it has received that no recorded music will be played and that no Jewish employee will be required to work on Shabbat.

Obituary

Ottawa editor 'was a gentle, kind, loving person'

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Barry Fishman, the former editor of the Ottawa Jewish Bulletin, died on Oct. 22 after a three-year battle with Lou Gehrig's disease. He was 58.

Attendance at his funeral the following day was indicative of Fishman's personality and eclectic interests. The service itself was conducted jointly by Rabbi Steven Garten of Temple Israel, a Reform congregation, and Cantor Daniel Benlolo, who is Orthodox, both of whom were Fishman's friends. In addition, as noted by Rabbi Garten, a number of other rabbis came to pay their respects to a man who personified the word "respect." There were also many former colleagues, as well as family and friends – old and new.

Barry Fishman

Anna-Rae Fishman, a "double" first cousin (their mothers were sisters and their fathers were brothers), told of their childhood growing up in a duplex like one big family in Sault Ste. Marie, Ont., and of the very special relationship they developed as a result of their upbringing.

Fishman had been editor of the Jewish Bulletin for seven years prior to being diagnosed with amyotrophic lateral sclerosis (ALS) in 2006, and he continued to work as long as his health permitted.

But his illness – a progressive, usually fatal, neurodegenerative disease caused by the deterioration of nerve cells that control voluntary muscle movement – forced him to step down in 2008, and he was named editor emeritus.

Even when he could no longer go to the office, he did some writing from home and contributed story ideas and suggestions via the numerous writers who had become his friends and often dropped by to visit.

Mitchell Bellman, president of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, which publishes the Bulletin, also spoke at Fishman's funeral. "I met Barry when he applied for the job of editor of the Ottawa Jewish Bulletin. During the interview he told us about growing up in a small community and how he was representative of the unaffiliated people we were trying to reach," Bellman said.

In an interview with The CJN when he became editor emeritus of the Bulletin, Fishman spoke about that focus. "What I am most proud of is opening the paper to diverse voices in the Jewish community… I wanted to do stories about Jewish people doing interesting things, both within the Jewish community and outside the Jewish community, and to give a voice to those who may not have been well represented in the paper before," he said.

"I always believed that the paper evoked his personality, and he was so proud when people would comment how much they love the paper," Bellman said. "He would also love it when the paper stirred up controversy, and he always wanted to be the person standing up for the little guy."

Fishman's cousin, Paul Bregman, grew up with him in Sault Ste. Marie.

"As small-town Jews, we knew the importance of family, community and being ambassadors for the Jews all over the world," Bregman said. "Barry was a gentle, kind, loving person. He had only friends, because he was a good listener, empathetic and a real people person."

Those who knew Fishman – and his friends were legion – all spoke of his kindness and concern for others, even in the face of his own debilitating disease, as well as his wonderful sense of humour.

Fishman is survived by his wife, Phyllis Bloch, whose constant care enabled him to remain at home until the end; his sister, Susan, and her children, Craig, Deborah and Sarah.

Those wishing to make donations in Fishman's memory can do so through the Barry Fishman Ottawa Jewish Bulletin Scholarship Fund at the Ottawa Jewish Community Foundation (613-798-4696, ext. 232; www.jewishottawa.com). Funds raised will be used to create an internship at the Bulletin.

Fraternity raises $4,000 for breast cancer research

By MICHAEL ISENBERG
Special to The CJN

LONDON, Ont. — AEPi, a Jewish fraternity at the University of Western Ontario, raised nearly $4,000 during its 20th annual Rock For Research (RFR) fundraiser.

The money was donated last month during a 36-hour period and broke the 2008 record by about $500.

"Raising so much money in such a short time, it says a lot about our guys," said Spencer Hoffman, AEPi's philanthropist chair at Western. "We are so pleased with how much care and attention people gave the event."

RFR is a charity for breast cancer research that takes place on Western's campus during the last two weeks of October and has been a "staple" to the fraternity's charitable endeavours, Hoffman said. This year, the event began the morning of Oct. 21 and ended the following evening.

RFR consists of five fraternity brothers, called "rockers," who camp outside the school's student centre (UCC) for 36 hours straight, raising awareness about breast cancer while collecting donations. They give out pamphlets on cancer and sell shirts, key chains and other memorabilia to increase total proceeds.

Breast cancer is the chosen cause over other diseases and cancers because it's a common form of cancer and is found in both men and women, Hoffman said.

Each year, five new brothers are selected to rock, usually the senior students, which gives the first- and second-year brothers something to look forward to for the future. Over the last several years, rockers have kept memoirs of their experiences, which they leave for new brothers to read, further increasing the younger brothers' anticipation to rock.

This year's rockers were Eric Silverberg, Sammy Waxman, Jesse Rubinoff, Corey Cott and Daniel Klerer.

While other brothers hang around the UCC and help out during their free time, it's the five rockers who remain outside for the whole event.

"These guys are relentless," Hoffman said. "They stay outside no matter what the weather's like. Last year, we had a wicked storm we worked in. This year, when setting up at 6 a.m., it was freezing temperatures and started to rain."

Hoffman said that it's the rockers unique approach to canvassing that enables them to stay outside the entire time and it also encourages many people to make donations.

RFR got its name when founder Steve Liakos first ran the event, sitting in a rocking chair. This attracted a lot of people to inquire about his cause, Hoffman said.

Rocking chairs have since been replaced by couches, so the rockers can feel relaxed and have fun.

"It's all about adding the human element," Hoffman said. "Our guys play games, toss footballs. They take the cause quite seriously, but they make people on the streets feel comfortable and want to get involved."

But more than just having many students contribute and participate in the event, RFR "connects the entire Jewish – and non-Jewish – Western [university] community," Hoffman said. "People go to class in the morning and see us. They pass us again in the afternoon. And when those same people see us outside the next morning, they feel really inspired and want to start their own campaigns.

"People know us. [RFR] creates campus identity."

What makes AEPi at Western distinct from other fraternities and AEPi brotherhoods is its emphasis on charitable efforts at large.

At the start of October, Western ran its third annual AEPi Invitational For Magen David Adom (the Israeli ambulance service), a golf tournament that raised more than $5,000. AEPi's two October charities alone raised nearly $10,000.

"It's important to give back," Hoffman said. "Magen David Adom does so much for Israel, so much for the Jewish people. We need to say thanks."

AEPi at Western already has several charity events lined up for the winter, including a hockey game against other fraternities and a few fundraisers.

"This is AEPi," Hoffman said. "It's what we do."

Community sponsors Dead Sea Scrolls conference

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

University of Toronto's Centre for Jewish Studies director Hindy Najman said that an international conference she organized on the Dead Sea Scrolls will not be a politicized event.

Rather, it's about the "intrinsic value" in understanding our community throughout history, she said.

The conference, The Dead Sea Scrolls: Transmission of Traditions and Production of Texts, running from Nov. 15 to 18, will attract leading scholars from North America, Israel, and Europe to lecture about key issues relating to late ancient Judaism and the scrolls, a selection of which are on display at the Royal Ontario Museum until Jan. 3.

"The enduring interest in Jewish antiquity and in the Dead Sea Scrolls is really not due to any commercial use of the material, but to the intrinsic value of understanding our own community through the understanding of history and civilization," said Najman, an associate professor of ancient Judaism at U of T who obtained her PhD at Harvard University.

International scholars set to speak at U of T's Centre for Jewish Studies

"This is not a politicized event in any way. It's just about understanding Jewish civilization. If what comes out of it is also ways of understanding the three monotheistic faiths, that's great. If what comes out of it is a better understanding of biblical study and the importance of Tanach in the world, or how people think about ritual or religion in the temple and outside of the temple, that's great."

Najman said that the conference was intended to complement the exhibit at the ROM, adding that she initially proposed the idea to the curators of the scrolls exhibit about having a world-class international conference that would attract some of the best scholars on the subject to Toronto.

"What I did was invite not just my colleagues here at U of T, but also from McMaster University– Eileen Schuller is a [religious studies] professor there, and she is one of the conference organizers."

Najman said she also got sponsorship support from York University's Centre for Jewish Studies, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies.

Najman said she is thrilled about being able to create partnerships between the Centre for Jewish Studies at U of T and all the sponsors, but she is most excited about working with UJA Federation.

Hindy Najman

"This is a very high-profile event and [UJA Federation president] Ted Sokolsky and the entire federation has come forward and said, 'We want to work with you, we want to bring everything that is wonderful about the Centre for Jewish Studies to the larger Jewish community,'" Najman said.

"It is really an effort between U of T and the Jewish community to create a great, world-class conference that has both popular components – there are parts of the conference that are open and accessible to the public – as well as parts that are specifically geared to high-level academic discussion and students."

Two events that are meant for the general public are lectures titled "The Scribes of Qumran," by Hebrew University of Jerusalem professor Emanuel Tov, held at the ROM on Nov. 15, and "The Dead Sea Scrolls and Judaism Today," by Harvard University professor James Kugel on Nov. 16 at the University of St. Michael's College.

Another component of the conference that Najman is excited about is the involvement of students from the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

Four scholars from abroad and two local scholars in Toronto are going to meet with a group of CHAT students on Nov. 18 to speak about the scrolls and answer questions.

She added that the students have already toured the exhibit at the ROM, but CHAT teacher Alex Gropper, who is also a conference organizer and the Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies president (as well as a CJN columnist), opted to bring a group of his students to meet with the scholars.

"These are students who have all seen the exhibit, and now they're going to hear about it from people who are excited about it. I chose people who are great scholars but also people who know how to teach high school kids," Najman said.

She said the conference is an opportunity for the community to learn and understand that "the idea of the Jewish people is inseparable from the idea of Jewish texts and Jewish study. This is an opportunity to see how the Dead Sea Scrolls really brings together the study of Jewish civilizations and the study of formation of our scriptures, that is, the Tanach.

"But it's not just about Tanach, it's about identity, interpretation and law. They are all inextricably linked in antiquity."

Kidding Around

Fast-paced action in Jacob Two-Two on the High Seas

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor

There could be no better story teller to revive the rollicking literary life of Jacob Two-Two than the fine Canadian writer Cary Fagan.

And we are thankful that he has.

For after a considerable time away, Jacob Two-Two has returned to entertain us with a new adventure and funny, panicky predicaments that spring from Fagan's rich and lively imagination.

With permission from the family of Jacob's creator, the late Mordecai Richler, Fagan has picked up the trail of the impish hero with Jacob Two-Two on the High Seas (Tundra Books, Toronto, Illustrated by Dusan Petricic).

The story fits chronologically between the first two of the three Jacob books that Richler wrote. Neither sequel nor prequel, High Seas is a sort of in-the-middle-quel in the zany life of the memorable six-year-old.

More important for Two-Two's many fans, the story fits seamlessly into the flow of Jacob's three previous adventures.

Fagan has maintained Jacob's intrepid character while inventing a tantalizingly new exploit in which our hero must be both the rescuer and the rescued.

High Seas can be read out loud or silently. It has a suspenseful plot and a bucketful of weird and wacky characters who entangle Two-Two and his comrades in a thick-as-Irish wool drama full of comedic dread and danger.

As the title of the book tells us, the story takes place on board a ship with the oops-something-must-be-wrong-here name SS Spring-a-Leak.

The plot involves pirates, treasures, fast-paced action, bad guys, good guys, comradeship, courage, heroism, tension, suspense, wisdom and lots and lots of fun.

The gaps or disconnects between the world of adults and that of young children, a theme that infuses the three previous Jacob books, courses through High Seas as well.

And of course, the story ends well.

Fagan is a talented writer, spinner of yummy yarns and teller of tall tales. He has won many awards for both his children and adult works. He is widely recognized as a major shining jewel in Canada's literary crown.

One small excerpt below from High Seas will amply demonstrate why he won those awards.

Jacob Two-Two on the High Seas will delight readers of all ages. Its various messages are aimed at adults as well as at children, with language that is sharp, a story that both amuses and thrills and a style of writing that entertains and elevates.

Welcome back Jacob Two-Two!

Excerpt

"I don't know of any treasure aboard the SS Spring-a-Leak. Why do you think there's treasure here?"

"Because I have a spy on your ship."

"A spy aboard the SS Spring-a-Leak? Outrageous. When I find out who the spy is, I'm going to take away his dessert for a week. Make that two weeks. Mr. Scrounger, do you know who the spy is?"

"I do, Captain."

"Don't tell me, let me guess. Is it the bosun?"

"No, Captain."

"Is it the cook?"

"No, Captain."

"I know who it is! I know who it is!" Jacob said.

"You couldn't possibly know," said Captain Sparkletooth."You're going to say something ridiculous, like it's Mr. Scrounger."

"But it is Mr. Scrounger! It is Mr. Scrounger."

The captain sighed. "Mr. Scrounger, tell Jacob that it isn't you."

"But it is me," Mr. Scrounger said.

"Stop fooling around. This is serious," said the captain.

"No, I mean it," said Mr. Scrounger. "Hold on, I'll prove it."

Mr. Scrounger hurried away while everyone else stood waiting. Even Crossbones, who was muttering under his breath while he cleaned his nails with the tip of his sword. Mr. Scrounger appeared again, this time with the parrot on his shoulder and the black eye patch around his head.

"See! See! I'm a pirate, too. Don't I look like one now? Say something parrot," he cried.

The parrot tilted its head, clacked its beak, and squawked, "Pirates and pickles cost only a nickel! Pirates and pickles cost only a nickel!"

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Geriatrics more important than ever, doctor says

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The study of geriatrics has undergone monumental changes in the past couple of decades, says Dr. Michael Gordon, medical program director of palliative care at Baycrest.

"Society and the media have changed their views remarkably. [Whereas] geriatrics [used to be] marginalized, it is now in the centre of the health care system."

Although there are only 220 geriatricians in Canada, geriatrics is a growing field, he said. "Geriatrics was first recognized in 1981 – it was a latecomer [in the field of medicine.]

"Not as many doctors want to look after older people, and geriatrics is on the bottom of the economic ladder of remuneration. The good news, though, is that in the last four years, more people have applied than ever before."

Gordon, whose father is 98, was speaking at Baycrest as part of its speaker series Aging, Innovation and the Mind. Guest host of the evening was CTV News anchor Sandi Rinaldo, who has a 97-year-old father.

The "phenomenal" change is partly due to the fact that years ago, seniors couldn't survive conditions that they can now live with for decades, said Gordon, who writes a monthly column on geriatrics for The CJN.

"Conditions such as heart failure had a short prognosis, and [then people lived with it] for a few miserable years. With proper intervention, they can now live with it for decades," he said.

"There are still conditions in which the control is not where we want it, but the terrain has changed. We can do more than watch," he added.

Adult children of aging parents – there are more than nine million Canadians between the ages of 40 and 59 whose parents need care – should be aware that as we get older, everything takes more time. "If you are [walking] with a person who is slow, slow your own pace," Gordon advised.

There are natural losses such as hearing, vision, gait and mobility, he said. "Hearing doesn't just mean sound. It could also mean differentiating words, and that can be fixed as simply as facing the person and speaking one thought at at time."

Technology is now "phenomenal," but hearing aids don't always work. "We can only work with what we have left. Sometimes we can hear sounds, but our interpretation is impaired."

Gordon said that memory loss affects everyone, but alone, it means nothing.

Dr. Michael Gordon

"Dementia, [though], is an umbrella term, and it includes many conditions, among which is Alzheimer's," he said.

"The good news is that the risk factors for Alzheimer's are the same as the risk factors for heart disease, such as high blood pressure and lipids, and diabetes."

The more changes you can make, the better, he said. "Controlling blood pressure is critical. There are great medications available, and you can limit the amount of salt you eat.

"Diabetes and high cholesterol are related to obesity and diet, and if diet alone doesn't control them, again, there are medications."

People who use their brain a lot seem to have some protection against cognitive decline, he said. "It is good for your mind for it to be engaged and active. Socialization also has a protective affect. At Baycrest, we promote social programs because we know it is good for people."

In his work, he said, he tries to help spouses or children figure out how to get their loved ones to do what's reasonable to protect themselves.

"Caregivers have to make sure they have a discussion about 'what they would do, if,'" Gordon said.

"It's not an easy talk, but if something happens to someone else close, you could ask, 'What if that happens to 'us?' You could also talk about a [relevant] newspaper article. Many older people welcome the discussion rather than fear it. The hardest part is how to deal with disagreements on care."

Try to give older people the best information and advice, Gordon said, "but they have to feel in as much control as possible."

Years ago, he said, seniors lived "in a nursing home or not. Now, though, the spectrum has changed, and there are options that didn't exist before. You have to navigate what's available depending on your financial situation and get to know the system before you're in a crisis."

It's very important for caregivers to find a balance in their own lives. "If you don't protect yourself, you will burn out. You have to come to terms with what you can reasonably do for yourself and for them," he said. "When you are unable to help them, then you will really feel guilty."

When you're with your parents, he advised, "listen to their stories again and again. They are an important part of their lives, and [the stories] often bring up good memories."

Nurses take part in Canada-Israel exchange

"It's a long-term, sustainable [exchange], and we've brought the two partners together to work on common projects."

Potential areas for partnership development include clinical practice, education and staff development, research and quality of care, she said.

Lidya Rychani, director of nursing at the Edith Wolfson Medical Centre in Holon, who was here with Goldberg, said that Israel can't keep up with nurses' need for education. "They are keeping up better here."

Beduz said that both countries face challenges in recruiting and retaining nurses. "The calibre of applicants here has improved, though. We find that it is often a second career choice. [Becoming a nurse] is something they've always wanted to do."

All agreed, however, that there is a worldwide shortage of nurses.

In the past 10 years, nurses in Israel have gained authority, Rychani said. "They are receiving better education, more training, and are given more responsibilities. We are going through now what Canadian nurses have already been through.

"Nurses are functioning more independently, and they are co-ordinating care. More are taking on nurse practitioner roles," she said.

Band fuses Israeli pop music with Middle Eastern, African and Asian sounds

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Times of London called him a "one-man Middle East peace accord" and his 2006 internationally released EP was hailed by Billboard magazine as a "multi-ethnic tour de force."

But Idan Raichel, the 32-year-old dreadlocked Israeli music sensation responsible for the Idan Raichel Project – an international band that includes collaborations with 85 musicians and singers from around the world – said that he just feels lucky to be able to make music with people he loves working with.

Raichel, the project's keyboardist and composer – who will performing with seven other group members at Toronto's Queen Elizabeth Theatre on Nov. 15 as part of his North and South American tour – is famous for fusing Israeli pop music with Middle Eastern, African and Asian sounds.

Raichel said that his latest album, Bein Kirot Beiti, or Within My Walls, "is the first time I can say that this project brings lots of colours from Israeli society, but also bringing the world to Israel by having vocalists from outside of Israel participate in this project."

Within My Walls, released worldwide earlier this year, includes songs in Hebrew, Arabic, Spanish, Cape Verdean Creole and Swahili.

The album's first track, All the Words, is a perfect example of the fusion between different musical sounds.

Raichel added a Middle Eastern flavour to the track with flutes and Arabic string instruments, the tar and the oud.

The album closes with a track titled Maisha by African singer Somi, who sings in Swahili of a young orphaned girl struggling with the impact of war and violence on Africa's youth.

Meanwhile, the album's title track deals with walls and the way they simultaneously protect and isolate people.

"It questions, what are these walls? Is it something that protects you? Is it something that blocks your view from the outside? Do you chose to live within your walls or are you being forced? Most of the songs deal with this topic," Raichel said in an interview with The CJN from his home in Tel Aviv.

But Raichel insists that it isn't a commentary on the Palestinian-Israeli conflict, as he makes a point of keeping his political opinions away from his art.

He said he doesn't think his role as a leader of a music group has anything to do with his political views, which are constantly evolving.

Rather his music includes messages of love and tolerance, which he said is "a side effect" because an album that includes musicians from all over the world couldn't be made without tolerance and respect for other cultures.

He said that a project like his allows his audience to learn about the diverse members of the Israeli community and learn more about the places they come from.

"I'm happy that the project, more and more, is becoming the soundtrack of Israel outside of Israel, and people can see, or can listen, or can think other things about Israel [beyond the conflict]," Raichel said.

"In terms of politics, we are very different. We have super right-wing people in the project singing side by side with left-wingers, or Mira Awad, an Arabic singer. We have new immigrants singing with Israeli natives... I think this shows another face of Israeli society."

Raichel, who burst onto the music scene seven years ago after his first single, Bo'ee, or Come With Me, helped his first album sell 150,000 copies, began his love affair with world music when he decided at age nine to pick up an accordion, "the non-coolest instrument ever," but one that is a staple of world music.

"By playing accordion, I think it kept my ears open to music from all over the world. Also, the folk Israeli music, called horah, is based on accordions. This is what kept my ears and eyes open to the differences in the Israeli community," Raichel said.

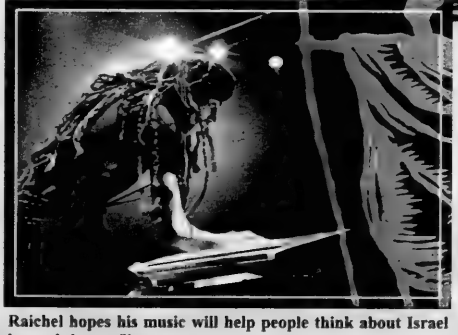
"For those who are not familiar with Israeli society, it is all about immigration. Every 10, 15, 20 years, there is new immigration that changes the face of the society. In Israel, we don't live in ghettos or quarters. It's not like there is a Chinatown or a Moroccan quarter.

"You can find on the same block people who lived here for seven generations and people who just came from Morocco or from the villages in Eastern Africa, from Ethiopia."

He said that whether the musicians he works with are 16 or 89 years old, whether they come from Ethiopia or Morocco, he works with people who live in an Israel that allows them to embrace their roots and heritage.

Raichel, who said he would love to work with Canadian musician Leonard Cohen one day, said that his wish is to "be able to continue making music and doing things I love to do with people that I love working with.

Idan Raichel and seven members of the Idan Raichel Project as scheduled to perform in Toronto on Nov. 15.



Raichel hopes his music will help people think about Israel beyond the conflict.

"I wish that we can play our music to people outside of Israel, people who just want to see another side of Israeli society without even thinking about the terrible Israeli-Palestinian conflict. There are beautiful things that are still going on, even in terrible times."

Raichel added that he was looking forward to playing for a Canadian audience again, because he finds the Jewish community in Toronto and in other Canadian cities "very welcoming."

"We feel that people in Canada in general can get the idea of the multicultural nation of Israel. I think there is much more tolerance in Canada, and it comes much more naturally and not from an arrogant fake place."

Although Raichel and his band mates have become accustomed to "touring airports" rather than visiting cities, he said that they will be spending the night in Toronto following their performance.

"So if you have anything to show us, please meet us back stage after the concert!"

Homemade soup warms you on a cold evening

By RANDY FINGRUT
Special to The CJN

There's nothing more inviting than returning home on a cold, damp day to a piping hot bowl of delicious soup. Throughout history, people from all over the world have enjoyed preparing soup. The first step was the invention of waterproof and heatproof containers. These containers were filled with an imaginative array of local ingredients, and then carefully placed over a cooking fire. Our ancestors learned that simmering numerous wholesome ingredients together in water altered the taste of the combination. They noticed that the ingredients lost their individual tastes and then united to form a unique flavour of their own.

The pursuit of this new cookery also led to the discovery that cereal grains, when added to a simmering pot, released starch granules and caused the soup to thicken rapidly. With the discovery of numerous varieties of starch, soup evolved as the centuries passed. The addition of potatoes, corn, rice or beans, allowed for the creation of soups that were not only tasty, but filling as well. Around the world, people continue to blend together new combinations of regional and cultural ingredients, giving us an infinite variety of soups. I encourage you to warm up tonight with your choice of the "soup du jour."

ZESTY MEXICAN SOUP

If you have not cooked with chipotle peppers in adobo sauce, you are in for a treat. This is the smoky, spicy flavour you have often tasted in Mexican restaurants but have not been able to identify, until now. Use the chilies sparingly, removing the seeds, as they are very potent. Chipotle peppers in adobo sauce are available in small tins and are found at the supermarket in the Mexican food isle.

1 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
1 medium onion, chopped
3 garlic cloves, chopped finely
1 green pepper, chopped
1 red pepper, chopped
2 celery stalks, chopped
1 can corn niblets, drained
1 can plum tomatoes, drained and chopped
6 cups vegetable stock
1 chipotle pepper in adobo sauce, seeded and chopped
2 tbsp. of adobo sauce
juice of 1 lime
1 tbsp. dried cumin
1/4 cup fresh cilantro, chopped finely salt to taste
sour cream or yogurt as garnish
1/4 cup cilantro, chopped finely as garnish
tortilla chips

In large pot, heat oil, sauté garlic, onion, celery, and red and green peppers until soft. Add stock, tomatoes and corn. Cover and simmer for 20 minutes, stirring occasionally. Add chipotle chili pepper in adobo sauce, lime juice, cumin, cilantro and salt. Simmer one minute.

Garnish with sour cream, cilantro, and broken tortilla chips. Freezes well.

WHOLE WHEAT PASTA FAGIOLI

Red kidney beans are well known for their health benefits and their deliciously unique taste. What we learn with this recipe is that the beans will transform as the soup simmers. Beans easily absorb the other seasonings, while thickening the soup.

Whole wheat pasta fagioli, is a hearty way to nourish and satisfy any soup aficionado.

2 cans Italian seasoned tomatoes
2 cups canned crushed tomatoes
2-3 large carrots, chopped finely
3-4 celery stocks, chopped finely
4 cups vegetable stock
3 cans red kidney beans, rinsed and drained
4 cups (dry) whole wheat broad noodles
salt to taste
1/4 tsp. pepper
parmesan cheese

In large pot, place tomatoes, vegetables, stock and pepper. Bring to a boil and simmer for 5 minutes. Meanwhile, mash 1/2 of the beans and add both mashed beans and whole beans to the soup. Simmer for 15 minutes, stirring occasionally to make sure nothing sticks to the bottom.

Add pasta and simmer for 8 minutes. Continue to stir. Salt to taste. Serve garnished with parmesan cheese. Freezes well.

TARRAGON AND MONTEREY JACK BISCUITS

No soup is complete without great bread. Try your hand at preparing your own. These biscuits are easy and quick and will really impress your family and guests.

2 cups all-purpose flour
1 tbsp. baking powder
1 tsp. salt
3/4 cup milk
1/3 cup unsalted butter, cold
3/4 cup Monterey Jack cheese, grated
3 tbsp. fresh tarragon, chopped

Preheat oven to 450. In food processor, combine flour with baking powder and salt. Add butter and pulse (chop) into flour mixture until coarse. Add milk and run until a ball forms. Turn out onto floured board and mix in cheese and herbs. With floured hands, pat into a thickness of approximately 1/2 in. Cut out shapes with a circle cookie cutter.

Place on parchment-covered cookie sheet and bake until golden, 12 to 15 minutes. Serve warm or at room temperature.

Biscuit mixture can be prepared in advance and refrigerated for a day. When needed, bring to room temperature and bake as directed.

Toronto physicians visit Eilat hospital

UJA Federation fundraising helps provide new emergency facilities

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

EILAT — Joseftal Hospital is to get a new emergency facility with the help of a $1 million fund (US) raised by the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The hospital will break ground in February-March 2010 for an expanded emergency facility that will include a main intake hall, trauma unit, hypobaric isolation unit, pediatric unit, ambulatory care unit, waiting room, social worker room, conference room and children's waiting area.

The Ministry for the Development of the Negev and the Galilee is contributing $1 million to the project, and Clalit Health Services, which owns Joseftal Hospital, is contributing $2 million.

Last week, some 35 Toronto health practitioners, their friends and family members visited the hospital in Eilat. They were there as part of UJA Federation's ninth annual doctors, dentists and friends mission to Israel, from Oct. 21 to 27.

"We come to get educated on Israel's social and political issues," Dr. Irving Gottesman, co-chair of the delegation, said. "We bring this information back to the Toronto Jewish community, in the hope of eliciting stronger commitment from community members to the Sate of Israel."

The Joseftal Hospital is one such Israeli social issue. The hospital, which was founded in 1969 and is the only advanced medical facility in the region (the next closest emergency room is 240 kilometres away), is in dire need of an upgrade.

Although Eilat is a community of only 60,000, the population the hospital serves could grow up to 200,000, when you consider the non-permanent populations on nearby kibbutzim, Israel Defence Forces soldiers who train in the region, and the large number of tourists who visit Eilat at different times of the year, Dr. Avi Goldberg, CEO of Joseftal Hospital, said.

Due to Eilat's small permanent population and its peripheral location, Joseftal suffers from a severe lack of resources. "It is very difficult to find the resources to grow and develop. The hospital is in a constant state of deficit," Goldberg said.

Currently, the emergency room is made up of a single hall with only eight emergency stations. One additional bed serves for resuscitation and is divided from the rest of the ER by a curtain. There is no triage facility, no observation area and no walk-in clinic. Privacy for patients and their families is also lacking.

"The Jewish community in Toronto answered an urgent call from this small, peripheral and isolated hospital, which desperately needs investment both internally and externally in order to advance forward," Goldberg said. "The Toronto community didn't just contribute to the project. They put in the seed money. If it weren't for the UJA's commitment, there would be no project."

Gottesman said: "Joseftal is a wonderful hospital and it serves a wonderful purpose, being here for both tourists and people who live here. It deserves to be upgraded to the 21st century."

Mission co-chair Dr. Howard Price added: "We have been connected [to the Joseftal Medical Center] for years and agree that they need to be a first-class hospital."

Goldberg said it's important that missions come and see Joseftal. "The more people that come here that are working in the Toronto medical system, the better," he says. "They can best understand our needs and our strategic plan for the next couple of years."

The Toronto community has also played a major role in helping the hospital attract top-quality health-care professionals from the centre of Israel. It is difficult to encourage experienced doctors and nurses, particularly those with sub-specialties, to work in the periphery, Goldberg said

The Toronto federation raised the funds for fellowships, each worth $60,000, for two Israeli doctors who, in exchange for funding, will commit to working at Joseftal for three years. "This program has done wonders," Goldberg said.

Gottesman said: "It is wonderful to see what the Toronto community has done here – what we have been able to do for them – and what they have been able to do for themselves."

Goldberg said he hopes to expand co-operation between health-care professionals from the Toronto community and Joseftal. "I would like for future medical missions to spend more time with us and strengthen personal and professional ties between staff at Joseftal and physicians from Toronto.

"There is a very special relationship between Toronto and Eilat," he says of the sister cities. "There is so much commitment and enthusiasm among members of the Toronto community. Having this contact with them, feeling their support, and watching our joint projects materialize is something very special. I have found true friends from Toronto, and we can really build on this relationship in the future."

Clinton hails 'unprecedented' Israeli settlement concessions

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Israel is making "unprecedented" concessions on West Bank settlement construction, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton said on Saturday after arriving in Israel in the latest U.S. bid to renew peace talks in the region.

The Obama administration had previously demanded that Israel halt all settlement building before negotiations could resume. But speaking at a joint press conference with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Clinton said there has never been such a precondition.

"It has always been an issue with negotiations," she said. "What the prime minister has offered in specifics of a restraint on the policy of settlements which he has just described – no new starts for example – is unprecedented in the context of prior to negotiations."

"It's also the fact that for 40 years, [U.S.] presidents of both parties have questioned the legitimacy of settlements, but I think that where we are right now is to try to get into the negotiations. The prime minister will be able to present his government's proposal about what they are doing regarding settlements, which I think when fully explained will be seen as being not only unprecedented in response to many of the concerns that have been expressed," Clinton went on to say.

Clinton also urged Israel and the Palestinians to immediately renew stalled peace talks.

"I want to see both sides as soon as possible begin in negotiations," she said. "Both President Obama and I are committed to a comprehensive peace agreement."

Netanyahu pointed out that Israel was willing to enter into peace talks without preconditions, but the other side was not.

"We think we should sit around that negotiating table right away," he said.

He repeated the concessions he is willing to make. Israel will build no new settlement communities, expropriate no land for existing ones and limit the number of permits for new housing construction.

Netanyahu said Israel was ready to start talks right away and that the Palestinians could bring their objections about settlements to the negotiating table.

"What we should do on the path to peace is get on it and get with it," he said.

The prime minister also blasted the Palestinian demand for a settlement freeze.

"But this is a new demand, it's a change of policy – of the Palestinian policy – and it doesn't do much for peace. It doesn't work to advance negotiations," Netanyahu said. "It actually is used as a pretext or at least as something, as an obstacle that prevents the re-establishment of negotiations."

Clinton and Netanyahu met a few hours after Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas rejected a U.S. proposal for the renewal of peace talks. During the press conference, the secretary of state said the talks with Abbas were "very useful."

The top U.S. diplomat arrived in Israel on Saturday evening. She subsequently met in Jerusalem with Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman and Defence Minister Ehud Barak.

Lieberman told Clinton that the Palestinian demand for a complete halt to West Bank settlement building was aimed at scuppering the peace process. He said the Palestinians had never demanded this as a precondition to peace talks before.

The foreign minister added that he had advised Netanyahu not to enter into negotiations with the Palestinians as long as they were promoting a damning United Nations report on Israel's winter offensive against Hamas in Gaza.

Saeb Erakat, the chief Palestinian negotiator, said earlier that Clinton proposed a formula for renewing the talks during a meeting with Abbas earlier in the day in Abu Dhabi. Clinton arrived in Abu Dhabi early Saturday after a three-day visit to Pakistan.

The proposal was for final-status talks to be relaunched on the basis of understandings over West Bank settlement construction reached between U.S. President Barack Obama's special envoy, George Mitchell, and the Israeli government, according to Erakat.

At a news conference after the Abu Dhabi meeting, Abbas said he told Clinton there would be no new negotiations unless Israel froze settlement building, Israel Radio reported.

He also reportedly added that Israel was crossing red lines in its recent suppression of disturbances on the Temple Mount in Jerusalem.

Ahead of the meeting, Erakat said that settlement building, which the Palestinians want Israel to halt completely, was the key to renewing peace talks, and that there were still differences between the two sides.

U.S. State Dep't reportedly evacuated Yemenite Jews

JTA

WASHINGTON — The U.S. State Department has secretly brought about 60 Yemenite Jews to the United States since July, the Wall Street Journal reported.

Another 100 are likely to come to the United States in the coming month, the newspaper said on the weekend.

Approximately 350 Jews were living in Yemen before the operation, according to the report. Yemen was once home to about 50,000 Jews in the early 1950s, but most emigrated to Israel.

In addition to the Yemenite Jews who will come to the United States, about 120 want to move to Israel and as many as 30 wish to stay in Yemen. Some of the Jews who want to leave are having difficulty selling off their homes and other assets.

The immigrants to the United States are being resettled in Monsey, N.Y., which has a large concentration of Jews from Yemen, by the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society. Jewish Federations of North America pledged $750,000 toward their resettlement.

The State Department had to pressure the Yemenite government to issue the emigres exit permits and passports. The Yemenite government had preferred to move the Jews to a safe haven in the capital, the Journal reported. Several families missed the two flights offered to them by the United States, the Journal reported.

The evacuation followed a year in which the Jewish community was subjected to increasing harassment and violence. In December 2008, a Yemenite Jew was killed by a Muslim man who ordered Jews to convert or be killed. The killer was sentenced to death.

Ha'aretz reported that 16 Yemenite Jews arrived in Israel on Sunday afternoon in a secret immigration operation orchestrated by the Jewish Agency.

Holocaust memorials erected in eastern Europe, some flawed

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
JTA

ROME — Under communism, Jewish suffering in World War II was generally treated as a footnote to the overall losses in what the Soviets called the "Great Patriotic War."

Public monuments existed at some Holocaust sites in eastern Europe, such as Auschwitz, the Paneriai forest near Vilnius where at least 70,000 Jews were killed, and Babi Yar, where tens of thousands of Jews were killed in ravines outside Kiev. But these usually commemorated generic "victims of fascism" and did not acknowledge the involvement of local collaborators.

Since the fall of communism 20 years ago, however, a host of new Holocaust memorials have gone up in post-communist states, and Communist-era monuments have been revamped by state authorities, local civic groups and Jewish organizations, giving the Jewish tragedy of World War II more prominence.

The new memorials range from simple plaques to modest monuments to huge memorial complexes, such as the monument at the Belzec death camp. A joint project of the Polish government and the American Jewish Committee, the monument was inaugurated in 2004 by the Polish president.

Some new sites, such as Belzec and the state-run Holocaust memorial centre in Budapest, which also opened in 2004, include museums or educational facilities.

In other cases, including at Babi Yar and Paneriai, new inscriptions or components have been added to provide more accurate information and context in order for the memorial site to teach and inform as well as commemorate.

These changes can become contentious if, for example, the new inscriptions make reference to local collaboration in the killing of Jews.

"After the problem of funding, the hardest part of getting monuments and memorials erected has not been getting some kind of general consent, but… working out the specifics of the design, and especially the language on the inscription," said the president of the International Survey of Jewish Monuments, Samuel Gruber, who has written about Holocaust memory and consulted on Holocaust monument projects.

"Most older memorials have been very general in their language, so much so that it is often hard to figure out what events are being commemorated, and rarely can one learn about who did what to whom and when," he said.

This remains a concern, even with monuments whose positioning and design make them prominent. Some memorials form a striking symbolic presence, but provide little or no information as to what they commemorate. Visitors are presumed to already know what they represent.

In the heart of the Slovak capital, Bratislava, for example, a chiselled image of a destroyed synagogue now serves as a Holocaust memorial. But other than the word "Remember," no information is provided as to how the wartime fascist state collaborated with the Nazis in killing most of Slovakia's 135,000-strong prewar Jewish community.

Likewise, in Sopron, Hungary, a small but powerful sculptural monument depicting empty clothing hung outside the Auschwitz gas chambers stands near an abandoned synagogue. The memorial bears Hebrew lettering and the Shema prayer, but no further information.

"How can one remember what one doesn't know?" Gruber commented. "How can one 'not forget' what is never fully discussed or taught?"

On Slovakia's Holocaust Memorial Day, Sept. 9, Slovak Prime Minister Robert Fico presided over the dedication of a memorial to Slovaks who helped rescue Jews at the time of the anti-Nazi Slovak National Uprising in 1944.

Funded by the Israeli Chamber of Commerce in Slovakia and several private sources, the memorial was built in the town of Zvolen next to the mass gravesite of Jews who were killed by the Nazis. It also includes a digital information station.

"This represents a different way of presenting Slovak national history that is at the same time a rejection of the [Nazi-allied] Slovak national puppet state of Josef Tiso," said Rabbi Andrew Baker, the American Jewish Committee's director of international Jewish affairs who has advised on Holocaust memorial projects in several countries. "Fico deserves credit for doing this, and he also speaks emotionally about the importance of Holocaust education in his country."

Though flawed at times, the memorials serve an important purpose.

"Memorials have a permanent presence," said Warren Miller, chair of the U.S. Commission for the Preservation of America's Heritage Abroad, which has been involved in Holocaust memorial projects in Latvia, Romania, the former East Germany and other countries. "Going to a powerful memorial will help people want to learn more."

L.A. shul shooting likely not hate crime, police say

JTA

LOS ANGELES — Los Angeles Police say there's no evidence of a hate crime or connections to terrorism in the shooting of two Orthodox Jews at a Los Angeles-area synagogue.

Police initially listed the Oct. 30 shooting at the Adat Yeshurun Valley Sephardic Synagogue in North Hollywood, Calif., as a hate crime, but sources told the Los Angeles Times that police are now looking into the possibility that it was related to a business or personal dispute. Police said one victim may have been the target and the other was shot because he witnessed the attack.

Maor Ben-Nissan, 53, and Allen Lasry both were shot in the legs. They were rushed to a hospital and underwent surgery, and were reported in good condition.

The shooter fled on foot. Police arrested a 17-year old African-American as a possible suspect, but released him. Detectives are studying videos taken by the synagogue's security cameras.

The same morning, a police bomb squad investigated a suspicious-looking shopping bag at the historic Wilshire Boulevard Temple and cordoned off the building. Police gave an all-clear after a three-hour search.

Security guards making the rounds had reported an unattended canvas shopping bag inside the gates, which had not been there the night before.

Howard Kaplan, the temple's executive director, said, "In light of the North Hollywood shooting this morning, we decided to err on the side of caution."

In the Adat Yeshurun shooting, a man described as dark-skinned and wearing a black hooded sweatshirt approached Ben-Nissan and Lasry in the synagogue's underground garage at approximately 6:20 a.m. on Oct. 30 and attempted to shoot one before his gun jammed. When the second congregant approached, the gunman shot both men.

Yehuda Oz, 57, was inside the synagogue with about 20 others when he heard four shots. One of the victims then ran into the synagogue, bleeding and screaming for help, Oz said.

The federation and ADL joined police in urging synagogues and Jewish schools to take extra precautions.

Adat Yeshurun has a diverse congregation, with some 150 families from Cuba, Argentina, Panama, Guatemala, Mexico, Algiers, Tunisia, Libya and Israel. The synagogue is located in an area with a large Orthodox Jewish population and numerous kosher stores, the Jewish Journal of Greater Los Angeles reported.

Jewish terrorist arrested for attacks on Palestinians, Jews

JTA

JERUSALEM — A Florida native, now resident of Shvut Rachel in the West Bank, was arrested for several hate crime attacks against Palestinians and Jews.

Yaakov Teitel, 37, was arrested last month, according to reports Sunday following the lifting of a gag order on the case.

Teitel is alleged to have killed two Palestinians. He also allegedly assembled a package bomb that seriously injured the son of a messianic Jew and set up a pipe bomb near the home of left-wing professor Ze'ev Sternhell.

Teitel, a father of four, made aliyah in 2000, although he has moved back and forth between Israel and the United States for the past 20 years, according to Ha'aretz.

Police said Teitel has confessed to the 1997 murders of a Palestinian cab driver and a Palestinian shepherd, planting several explosive devices in 2006 and 2007, sending the parcel bomb to the messianic family in Ariel last year and planting the pipe bomb near the Sternhell home in September 2008.

He also has supported, through leaflets and posters, a shooting attack last summer on a gay and lesbian teen club in Tel Aviv that left two dead. Shin Bet officials, however, told Israeli media that they do not believe Teitel was the shooter.

Teitel was arrested in Jerusalem in a joint police-Shin Bet operation on Oct. 7, Ynet reported.

Guns and parts used for making explosive devices were found in his home, according to reports. The guns included a sniper rifle, an M15 machine gun, an M16 automatic rifle and a Glock pistol. Teitel was licensed to carry a firearm.

Study ties Birthright Israel trip to stronger Jewish continuity

By JACOB BERKMAN
JTA

NEW YORK — Birthright Israel is linking a major fundraising push to a new study that says the program, which sends young Jews on free 10-day trips to Israel, has a major impact on Jewish continuity.

The study, released late last month by Brandeis University's Cohen Center for Modern Jewish Studies, found that those who went on Birthright trips are more likely to have stronger connections to Israel, raise their children as Jews and belong to a synagogue than their peers who have not made a Birthright trip.

Titled Generation Birthright Israel The Impact of an Israel Experience on Jewish Identity and Choices, the study is based on interviews with some 1,200 young people who applied for Birthright trips between 2001 and 2004 – two-thirds of them went on the trips, the applications of the others were denied. The survey compared the answers of the two groups.

Of some 500 people interviewed who are now married, 72 per cent who made the trip married Jews, while only 46 per cent of those who did not make the trip married Jews. This means that Birthright participants were 57 per cent more likely to marry within the faith, according to Len Saxe, the head of the Cohen Center and the researcher who oversaw the survey.

No Canadian data was gathered for the study, but "everything we know about Canadian participants suggests that Taglit [Birthright Israel Canada] has equal impact. The difference, however, is that the Canadian inmarriage rate is probably higher to start," Saxe said.

When the study's results were presented publicly at a Brandeis-owned building on Manhattan's Upper East Side, the head of the Boston federation hailed Birthright as the only successful recent big idea in the Jewish community.

"People are looking for the next big thing; we ain't finding no other big thing at this level," said Barry Shrage, the CEO of the Combined Jewish Philanthropies of Boston.

North American Jewish federations are partners in Birthright with the Israeli government and the private philanthropists who fund most of the project.

One requisite for launching the program in 1999 was that it incorporate rigorous controls to gauge if it was working, and this study is part of that effort.

Although Birthright paid for the study, Saxe said that as a tenured professor at Brandeis, he felt no pressure to find certain results to placate his funders. The Cohen Center that Saxe heads also houses the Steinhardt Social Research Institute, funded by Michael Steinhardt, one of the first Birthright philanthropists.

Saxe and Birthright officials acknowledge that there is a great deal of fundraising that hinges on his study's findings.

A number of Birthright's benefactors were in attendance when the results of the study were presented, among them Steinhardt and Charles Bronfman, who are credited with founding the program, as well as Lynn Schusterman and Michael Bohnen, who runs the foundation of Birthright's largest funder, casino mogul Sheldon Adelson. Immediately after Saxe had presented his findings, Steinhardt, Bronfman and Schusterman stood for a question-and-answer session and made a pitch for more money from more people, based on Saxe's results.

"I think this is a great report," Bronfman said. "Thirty years ago, we started hearing about the importance of informal Jewish education, and nothing happened. Then about continuity, and nothing happened. Then Birthright comes along, and change happened."

As he pointed to the report as evidence of Birthright's success, Steinhardt said that at first, the program "was overwhelmingly disliked by the midstream and by the institutional Jewish world.

"Jews around the world should be appalled by the level of education in the non-Orthodox Jewish world. It has to be very different, and I don't hear anything different today… This study is important because we have changed the Jewish world. Birthright and what we did – it created change."

The Birthright Israel Foundation, which oversees the approximately $80 million (all figures US) in private money that will flow into the project this year, is now seeking more money from smaller donors, and specifically from the federation system.

Birthright is still one of the best-funded Jewish philanthropic endeavours, but its budget has fallen in the past year. Birthright received a huge boost with $70 million in gifts from Adelson in 2007 and 2008, giving it a budget of $80 million in 2007 and $100 million in 2008. In 2009, the budget fell back to $80 million. The group expects a similar budget for 2010.

Volunteers help reunite cousins

Compiled by CJN Staff

JERUSALEM — Veronica Zer (formerly Rudas) last saw her (second) cousin Lili Reiter in 1945 when she returned to Hungary after surviving Auschwitz, where her mother and younger sister were killed.

They lost touch with one another when each of them went their separate ways to rebuild their lives after the war.

This past summer, volunteers from Yad Vashem's Shoah Victims' Names Recovery Project went to the Bayit B'lev nursing home in Jerusalem to assist survivors there fill out "pages of testimony" to commemorate their loved ones who were killed in the Holocaust.

Veronica, 81, asked to commemorate her cousins from the Reiter family. Searching the Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names, Yad Vashem staff discovered that Livia Prince, formerly Lili Reiter, had filled out pages of testimony for her parents, Viktor and Iren and for her sister Agnes in 2006.

The volunteers brought the pages of testimony to Veronica, who was overjoyed to discover her cousin's address in Toronto. She wrote to her immediately, and she received a phone call 10 days later.

Prince flew from Toronto to Israel to reunite with her cousin. Last week, they visited Yad Vashem together and lit a ner neshamah (candle of the soul) in Yad Vashem's Valley of Communities.

"For me [lighting the candle in the Valley of the Communities] this is closure… Not that there will ever be closure," Prince said.

"This is history, and now we have to talk about it, and fast," she said.

As part of Yad Vashem's effort to recover the names and identities of all the Jews murdered in the Shoah, Yad Vashem sends volunteers to survivors' homes and to nursing homes throughout Israel to help residents fill out pages of testimony in memory of the people they knew who were murdered.

Volunteers search the database to avoid duplicates and assist in the often emotionally difficult task of completing the forms. So far, the Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names contains some 3.6 million names.

Efforts are underway around the world to try to recover as many of the six million names as possible. People who know of individuals who were murdered in the Shoah are encouraged to visit Yad Vashem's website (www.yadvashem.org) to ensure that all the victims are memorialized in the Hall of Names. If there is no record of a name, pages of testimony should be completed in their memory.

To request pages of testimony and/or a volunteer to assist you in filling them out, contact Yad Vashem at: names.outreach@yadvashem.org.il.

Israel denies diamond charges

Israel refuted accusations by a United Nations panel that it was involved in the blood diamond trade. The panel said Israel was involved in the illegal export and sale of diamonds from the Ivory Coast. It also said the United Arab Emirates, Lebanon, Guinea and Liberia were not enforcing a UN embargo on buying the diamonds mined in the West African nation. A blood diamond refers to a diamond mined in a war zone and sold to finance an insurgency or warlord, usually in Africa. Civil wars in Angola, Sierra Leone and Liberia were financed largely by an underground diamond trade. "Israel has never dealt in diamond trade with the Ivory Coast," Israel's diamond controller, Shmuel Mordechai said. "We are shocked by these false accusations and completely refute them."

Israel refutes water charges

Israel has refuted accusations in an Amnesty International report claiming the Palestinians don't have access to an adequate supply of water. The Israel-Palestinian water policy is based on an interim agreement between the two parties, Israel said. "Israel has fulfilled all its obligations under the water agreement regarding the supply of additional quantities of water to the Palestinians, and has even extensively surpassed the obligatory quantity," according to a statement by the Foreign Ministry. "The Palestinians, on the other hand, have significantly violated their commitments under the water agreement, specifically regarding important issues such as illegal drilling and handling of sewage." The Amnesty report accuses Israel of denying the Palestinians the right to access adequate water by maintaining total control over the shared water resources and pursuing discriminatory policies. Israel's Foreign Ministry questioned the motivation of the human rights organization in releasing the report. "The authors of the report chose to ignore Israeli data, papers and reports, although they contain verifiable facts presented with total transparency," the ministry said. "This questionable approach, which consists of systematically disregarding Israeli material while relying exclusively on Palestinian allegations, raises doubts as to the real intentions of the report's authors and of the organization itself."

Palestinians file Gaza war claims

Some 1,500 notices of future civil lawsuits against the Israel Defence Forces over damages caused during the Gaza war have been filed in Israel. The claims by Palestinians in Gaza add up to tens of millions of dollars and deal with property and physical damage, as well as loss of earning capacity, Ynet - reported. The Israeli and overseas lawyers filing the notices say they'll file them in Israeli courts.

Gaydamak sentenced to jail

A French court sentenced Israeli-Russian billionaire Arcady Gaydamak to six years in prison for illegal arms dealing. Gaydamak, a businessman who owns the Israeli soccer team Beitar Jerusalem, was sentenced for being involved in deals in the 1990s. A French and Israeli citizen, he left Israel for Moscow 10 months ago. France and Israel have an extradition treaty; Russia and France do not. Gaydamak and a partner formed a company to sell $791 million worth of illegal arms, including tanks, helicopters and a warship to Angola. The operation involved some 40 suspects, including French government officials and public figures.

New olim descendants of Chinese Jews

A group of descendants from an ancient Chinese Jewish community moved to Israel. The seven young adults, all descendants of the Jewish community of Kaifeng, arrived last week in Israel on one-year entry permits. They will study Hebrew at a kibbutz ulpan and then undergo conversion to Judaism, according to Michael Freund, founder of the Shavei Israel organization, which brought the group to Israel. "This is a historic event," Freund said. "Kaifeng's Jewish descendants are a living link between China and the Jewish people, and it is very moving to see the remnants of this community returning to their roots." An estimated 1,000 Jewish descendants live in Kaifeng.

BEAUTY SHOP

By Stacey Michaels and Francine Birken

Dedicated in memory of Carol Wise.

Winter is almost here! The temperatures are beginning to change and so should your beauty regimen. Colder weather is the start of indoor heating, which will have a great effect on your skin.

Make sure to change to heavier moisturizers for your face. Use body lotions all over, especially on your feet, elbows and knees. Eye creams are a must for day and night. Many of us experience dry and chapped lips, so be sure to use a moisturizing lipstick and apply lip balms as often as possible. Not only does our skin get affected from these harsh temperatures but so does our hair. Try to apply treatments twice a week along with regular use of deep conditioners. A leave-in conditioner is great for that double moisture and beautiful shine.

Don't let the dark days get you down. Winter 2009 is all about bold colours.

Bright eye colours and dark lips are hot for this season. Thick eyebrows are back, and be sure to use tons of mascara or false eyelashes. Eyeliner extending out past the crease made up of a fine line helps to create that clean look. The winter look begins with eye colours such as blue, green and purple, and ends with dark and bold wine and burgundy-tinted lip stains. Glitter is hot, either on the body, face, or used as eye shadows.

Creamy blushers are great to use in the winter months.

Nails can also be affected during these months. Moisturize your hands and use a hardener and strong clear base before applying the dark dramatic nail shades.

Take advantage of your indoor gym and keep working out on your 30-minute fitness routine, and make sure to eat well. The cold temperatures may inspire you to stay indoors, but all of these warm vibrant colours will push you to go out there and show off how truly beautiful you look and feel.

Moroccanoil brushes are the next must-have styling tool! Adding to its line of superior products, Moroccanoil introduces an exclusive collection of hair brushes, sure to become a staple in your styling regimen. The brushes are constructed of high-quality materials and are made with ceramic and ionic properties. The ions in the bristles repel water, causing it to evaporate quickly, and the ceramic retains heat better and emits heat over a wider spectrum of frequencies, enhancing drying time.

STACEY'S TIPS

SPA & SKIN CARE: While we struggle to fight signs of aging on our face and hands, our lips present their own set of challenges. Fine lines surrounding the lip area are a common concern, but it is the lips themselves that speak the truth. Aging of the lips is due to increased water loss, loss of volume and changes in production of collagen, which results in a loss of fullness. This universal issue is now easily addressed with the introduction of new Dermaglow Nuvectin Anti-Aging Lip Treatment, which combines new and exclusive ingredients.

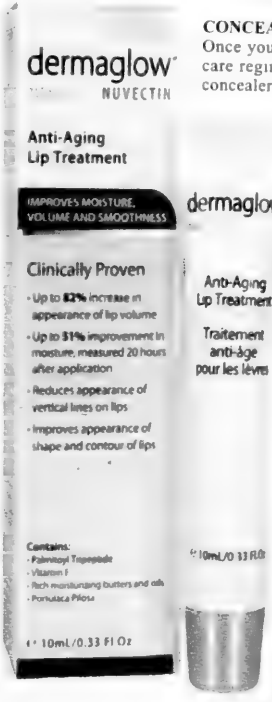
The new NeoStrata Anti Expression Cream stops expression lines in their tracks! Do you remember all the times you've smiled wide, laughed with abandon or fretted over your worries? Unfortunately, your skin has an excellent memory and permanently records every facial muscle contraction – conscious and unconscious – that you make. Left untreated, creases that are once reversible develop into permanent expression lines commonly known as frown lines, smile lines and crows' feet. For women who want to fight back but aren't ready for drastic measure à la Botox, NeoStrata introduces an exciting new topical alternative: Anti Expression Line Cream, an innovative blend of the botanically derived Myoxinol, which halts the formation of expression lines, and tried-and-true glycolic acid, which fights biological skin aging.

Yves Rocher will be completing its Culture Bio skin-care line with the following three new products, Wake up Lotion, Eye Cleansing Water and Night Lotion. Try it today!

Yves Rocher is launching a limited edition of its Canadian bestseller, the popular Arnica Essential Moisturizing Hand Cream, in an effort to raise funds for the Look Good Feel Better program. For every hand cream sold, $2 will be donated to this program, which helps women face their future with greater confidence by giving them tools to manage the effects that cancer and its treatment have on their appearance, and often their morale.

Advanced Research Laboratories unveils the fruits of their many years of stem-cell research to create Absolue Precious Cells advanced regenerating and replenishing cream, the first Lancôme skin-care product designed to trigger skin's innate regenerative potential by acting on the environment surrounding these precious cells.

Back in black! Trends might come and go, but when it comes to a colour that you can always count on, black is everyone's best friend. Secret's Little Black Sock is a wardrobe staple that takes care of all your style needs. From laid-back cuffs to fashionable knee-highs, Secret's Little Black Sock is the key to putting your best foot forward this season.



FRANCINE'S TIPS

CONCEALER AND FOUNDATION: Once you have completed your skincare regimen, you are ready for your concealer and foundation. Apply concealer under the eyes sparingly and blend, then take a look. If you have any blemishes that you may want covered, dab and blend. Mineral makeup continues to be a top trend for both foundation and finishing powder.

Don't hide your complexion; enhance it with Revlon ColorStay Mineral Foundation and Mineral Finishing Powder. The medium coverage foundation provides a colour that won't fade all day, making your skin look both healthy and flawless, no matter how long your day is. After you apply the foundation, you can apply the finishing powder. The powder can be worn alone and will be available late December.

Yves Rocher France Couleurs Nature 100% Natural Origin is proud to present, Sunny Glow Foundation. It covers like a foundation and at the same time has lightness like a powder. It supports your skin while still allowing it to breathe.

EYE MAKEUP AND BLUSH: Winter calls for more defined eyes. Have fun with all the new and exciting colours.

M·A·C Style Black enters the new goth, a sophisticated look with makeup that changes the mood to permanent midnight. If you are looking for that daring look, this collection is available for lips, nails and eyes. You can take it to where you want to!

Clarins Fragrance Group is proud to present the Mercury Mirror Collection (Limited Edition) – Ombre Stellaire – Mono Eye Shadow by Thierry Mugler in two shades, mercury and golden bronze. It has a unique formula for spectacular shine and incomparable hold. This line includes Mercury Explosion – Glitter Eye Liner. Blend the powders to the apples of the cheeks, the forehead, the temples, the chin and to cleavage. Blush this season should look rosy, just like you went for that half-hour brisk walk outdoors.

LIPS: Eyes are not the only thing that is bold this season. Lips this winter are dark and vibrant. Start looking for those wine-coloured and burgundy-tinted lip stains. Even the dark lip liners with gloss will achieve this dramatic look.

FRAGRANCES: Parties and holidays are approaching quickly; it's time to think about a new winter perfume. Try and look for fragrances that are warm, spicy, heavy and floral.

Ayala Sender, the Nose behind Ayala Moriel Parfums, is proud to introduce The Purple Dress. This fragrance is romantic in a chromatic, nocturnal, off-beat way. It is spicy and made up of a floral-tea-like composition, supported by hints of white magnolia and star anise.

For all the young ladies, hold on to your hats as Britney Spears introduces her newest fragrance, CIRCUS fantasy Britney Spears for Elizabeth Arden. This fragrance is made up of luscious fruits, tempting florals and creamy musks all made to capture fun, sexiness and glamour. The star blue glass bottle is made up of ruby red stones symbolizing the mischievous nature of the circus.

Yves Rocher Parfums introduces Tendre Jasmin, the fourth perfume in the Secrets d'Essences collection. Smell it once and be captivated forever.

For the Burberry lovers, Clarins Fragrance Group will introduce in November, Burberry London for Men and Women Limited Edition. Burberry London for women is made up of a floral bouquet with a spicy vibration. Burberry London for men has the scent of a woody spicy citrus. The top notes are joyful and has a crisp elegance to it.

Enjoy all of our wonderful beauty tips, and stay on top of the latest winter fashions. Charcoal and silver sets the overall trend for base colors, but if you want the real vibrant look, try wearing bright burgundy, purple or lime-green outfits. Faux animal prints and fashionable scarves are hot this season. Glamorous gold jewelry is making a comeback, as well as large handbags. Go out, impress and have fun!

INTENSIVE REPAIR: Environmental damage, heat styling and colour treatments can take their toll over time. Ojon Hair brand is introducing a new category of intensive repair products. Developed around its signature Ojon restorative hair treatment products, the intensive repair ritual nurtures and treats hair and scalp with the restorative and hydrating benefits of hand-harvested Ojon oil.

Shoulder pads are back

By ANITA SZABADI-GOTTESMAN
Special to The CJN

When leggings hit the runways last year, most of us of a certain age said there was no way we would be seen leaving home sporting a pair.

As far as we were concerned, the 1980s were long over, and the era in which many of us who should never have worn leggings wore them wouldn't creep back. Never say never, however, because the new look quickly morphed into long sweaters and T-shirts with leggings, neatly worn over stylish ankle boots or tucked into high riding boots. It wasn't so bad after all.

But now, new for 2009, are shoulder pads, as seen on the runways of the world. The pressing question is, are we willing to embrace or do we shudder at the thought of shoulder pads?

Once used only as protection for football players, shoulder pads were redesigned into smaller fabric-covered pads that began making their way into men's and women's clothing as early as the 1930s. Popularized by Joan Crawford in the 1940s, the suit-wearing starlet of the time, the shoulder pad lay low until the 1980s.

Traditionally used only in suiting, the shoulder pad reflected the look of strong, powerful shoulders and marked the beginning of the "power suit" fashion for women. The silhouette created by shoulder pads gave the illusion of a minimized waist set off by broad shoulders. If we remember back a few years, the '80s saw the addition of shoulder pads into all manner of clothing, including T-shirts, sweaters and blouses and, of course, a mainstay in suits and coats.

In addition, every woman had a pair of shoulder pads with Velcro attachments that slipped easily into the shoulders of any piece of clothing that did not originally come with pads, creating just a little lift. Some looks called for multiple shoulder pads for that extra extension and exaggerated look. While a sign of the times – strong women with equally strong shoulders – the look was hoped by all to be a passing fancy.

Shoulder pads are back on the runway in daywear and evening wear.

That is, until this year, when the top designers filled the runways of Europe with shoulder pads for day and evening wear. Givenchy, Dolce & Gabbana, Louis Vuitton and Marc Jacobs featured a range of clothing replete with shoulder pads. The pads luckily are slightly more feminine than the ones from the '80s, creating a softer look than those of a CFL or NFL linebacker.

As is always the case, designers have begun dressing starlets to show off their new lines. Victoria Beckham was seen sporting a glittery, body-hugging evening gown replete with shoulder pads at a recent event. Pop singer Rihanna also jumped on the bandwagon, appearing in a mini-dress with wide shoulders. They seem to be able to pull it off, but transferring the way-out-there look of the starlets from the runway to a female executive's or soccer mom's closet is the challenge.

Shoulder pads seem to be appearing in shoulders of a structured jacket to top most outfits. Also, a more structured blouse paired with a pencil skirt appears to be the way to go. Or just go to your closet and pull out your favourite 1980s stuffed-shouldered power blazer and try it on for size. We all have one in there that we thought we were just keeping for old time's sake.

Comedian Carol Burnett, unforgettable in the widest shoulder pads she could find, as Scarlett from Gone with the Wind.

The Lolita effect

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

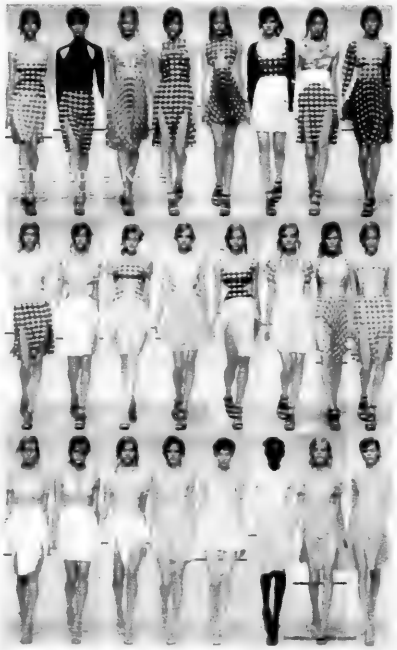
The presence and absence of femininity within fashion is something that will always be of interest, play and experimentation.

Futuristic androgyny has ruled the runways for quite awhile now. Strong, robotic, almost inhuman, sexless figures have been paramount, especially with the explosive popularity and influence of newer designers such as Rodarte and Gareth Pugh.

On the spring 2010 runways, though, (as many of you are thrilled to hear, I'm sure), it seemed that the pendulum was slowly swinging back to flirty and playful silhouettes. The resurgence of femininity was one of the most powerful messages for the season to come.

Stella McCartney and Sonia Rykiel channelled their new-found financial optimism through frilly and colourful dresses. Dolce & Gabbana played masculin féminin, juxtaposing slim tuxedo and riding-style suits against lingerie and lace. Even the usually leather-happy Alexander Wang softened his colour palette this season, favouring khaki, pale blue and white.

Perhaps the most interesting translation of femininity was the resurgence of the Lolita effect. The legendary character from Vladimir Nabokov's novel of the same name was later translated by Stanley Kubrick's 1962 film. She was a majorly sexualized, flirty-before-her-time girl named Dolores Haze (she was 12 years old in the original novel). The story is told by a professor, who later becomes her stepfather, whose obsession with her goes far beyond any appropriate boundary.



Models parade the Christopher Kane lineup.

With Lolita referenced by heavy hitters such as Chanel and up-and-comers like Christopher Kane alike, there was most certainly an air of good-girl-gone-bad on many of the runways this season.

At Chanel, models on a hay runway were swathed in ribbons, chiffon and lace. While the collection was almost completely ivory, models looked coquettish rather than pure. Cheeks were rosy, hair was light and bouffant-like, and lips were slightly smirking.

At Christopher Kane, Lolita's presence was even more obvious, with baby blue and pink gingham dresses being slashed, leaving exposed legs and midriffs. There were even more Lolita references, such as the strawberry print splattering on dresses at Yves Saint Laurent and short school-girl get-ups at Miu Miu.

What with director Roman Polanski in the news for his own Lolita involvement – the U.S. government is trying to extradite him from Switzerland because he fled sentencing in 1978 for the statutory rape of his own Dolores – dear little Lolita may as well be returning into our psyches. And when you think about it, it's quite a strange thing to be appealing, isn't it? I won't go as far as to say that its recurrence has something to do with our sexualized youths of this generation, because the story of Lolita, first published in 1955, goes back way further than Britney Spears, but there is definitely something to be said about Lolita's obvious influence in several shows this season.

Film traces the journey of Hana's suitcase

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Larry Weinstein's Inside Hana's Suitcase, opening in Toronto on Nov. 6, is a beautifully crafted, seamless documentary for all ages.

Weinstein artistically transforms Karen Levine's best-selling book, Hana's Suitcase, into a multi-layered Holocaust film unlike all others.

Inside Hana's Suitcase is the well-known, true story of Japanese educator Fumiko Ishioka's quest to solve the mystery of Hana Brady, the owner of a battered suitcase given by the Auschwitz Museum to Ishioka for the Tokyo Holocaust Education Resource Centre, and Ishioka's bitter-sweet discovery that Hana died in the Holocaust, but her brother, George Brady, survived and lives in Toronto.

After Weinstein read Levine's book – based on an article that first appeared in The CJN – he immediately envisioned a film that would blend several documentary techniques, including interviews, animation and dramatic reconstructions.

"I was inspired that this book is for young people and thought, let's have certain techniques that would appeal to children and do dramatizations and stylize them," Weinstein said in an interview in his Rhombus Media screening room. "And let's have animation and mix it with documentary and make the whole thing powerful and as emotional and as heartfelt as the story is."

Weinstein recreates scenes of Hana's childhood in Czechoslovakia and at two concentration camps – Terezin (Theresienstadt) and Auschwitz, where she died at age 13.

"I wanted people to meet Hana. I think people can only feel the loss if they can see the people they're losing," said the award-winning director of 25 avant-garde films on composers including Ravel's Brain, Beethoven's Hair and Mozartballs.

When Weinstein discovered that composers Hans Krasa, Gideon Klein and Pavel Haas lived in Terezin and also died in Auschwitz, sharing Hana's experience, he chose their music for the film, since it felt spiritually connected to the subject.

The poignant story, which takes place over 70 years and across three continents, is narrated through endearing child storytellers from Toronto, Tokyo and the Czech Republic.

"The children telling the story are clearly not Jewish children. They are children all over the world who all relate to the story. So there's something very hopeful in that," Weinstein said.

What resonates with the children are George and Hana's experience of being bullied because they're different and the fact that they are separated from their family.

"The film is about the warmth and beauty of the family unit, and that might be more accentuated within a Jewish situation where the family unit is so important. So, when you see that ripped apart, everyone senses it. That's pretty universal," Weinstein said.

The film shows that although George Brady, now 81, lost his entire family in the Holocaust, he was able to move on and find peace with the help of Ishioka and her Small Wings group of children.

The film has won several awards at film festivals, including the Canwest Award for best documentary and the National Film Board Colin Low Award for innovative filmmaking, and it placed third in audience favourites at last spring's Hot Docs Film Festival.

Inside Hana's Suitcase opens Nov. 6 at the Sheppard Grande, 4861 Yonge St. It will open in Vancouver on Nov. 13 and Montreal on Nov. 20.

A doomed romance in wartime Hungary

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Hungarians Hedy Weisz and Tibor Schroeder could not have chosen a more inauspicious time to fall in love than 1942. She was a Jew and he was a Christian in a country where mixed marriages were strictly forbidden.

With Germany's invasion of Hungary in 1944, their relationship was imperilled. Tibor, a reservist in the army, tried to save Hedy from the grasp of the Nazis, but his plan failed and he lost touch with her.

More than three decades later, Tibor, now an immigrant in Montreal whose marriage was falling apart, discovered that she lived only a few blocks away from him with her daughter.

Their bittersweet saga is told by Toronto filmmaker Susan Papp in Outcasts: A Love Story, which is scheduled to be screened at the University of Toronto's Munk Centre for International Studies on Nov. 9 at 7 p.m.

This fraught love affair unfolds in Nagyszollos – a remote but attractive town that has changed hands between Hungary, Czechoslovakia, the Soviet Union and Ukraine – and ends in Canada. It's both the story of a doomed romance and deep-seated intolerance.

Tibor, the scion of a prosperous family from the gentry, was mesmerized by Hedy, a stunning beauty whose father managed his parents' winery in the Carpathians. Papp tells us precious little about the lovers, and they remain ciphers.

Shortly after Germany invaded Hungary and herded the Jews of his town into a ghetto, Tibor devised a scheme to rescue Hedy. He would hide her in a secret compartment of a railway carriage, and the pair would escape and live happily ever after.

But after one night, Hedy went back to her family, refusing to abandon them to the Nazis and their local collaborators.

In the wake of the war, Tibor and his brother, Bill (Bela), were interned in a U.S. prisoner-of-war camp, where they almost starved. Tibor searched for Hedy, writing imaginary love letters to her. In one typical letter, he wrote, "Nothing matters, except seeing you again."

Hedy did not turn up, and in the meantime, Tibor settled in Paris and then in Montreal, where he "moved on" by marrying a divorcee with children.

In 1967, Tibor met Hedy, but the film is very vague about their meeting, which is maddening and inexplicable. What we're told is that Hedy moved to New York City and that Tibor died of cancer in 1982. Again, no details are revealed.

Much of Outcasts unfolds as Bill and Hedy's brother, Yitzhak Livnat, a resident of Israel, return to Nagyszollos to mine their memories of a town that has since changed but remains beautiful.

In a reflective moment, Bill muses that Hungary betrayed its Jewish citizens. "It was a big betrayal by Hungarians against Hungarians," he says, summing up Hungary's persecution of its Jewish nationals, both before and during the war.

There is a good story here, but the script falls short of the mark and squanders an opportunity. Papp has written a book about Hedy and Tibor, and one can only hope it is better than this mediocre documentary.

Passages: Lou Jacobi, the legendary Toronto-born actor who died on Oct. 22 in New York at age 95, first entered show business at the age of three when he sang in a charity concert for the founding of the Toronto Jewish Old Folks' Home. He sang with his father in numerous Jewish choirs, including one that accompanied the renowned Cantor Josele Rosenblatt. An accomplished violinist, he made his stage debut in 1924 as a violin prodigy in The Rabbi and the Priest at Toronto's Princess Theatre

After stints as the drama director of the local YMHA and as a standup comic at resorts in Muskoka and the Laurentians, Jacobi became an international star in both film and theatre, perhaps best immortalizing himself through his portrayal of Mr. Van Daan in the Broadway production of The Diary of Anne Frank (opened 1955), a role he reprised in the 1959 film directed by George Stevens.

His long list of stage, film and television credits ranged from appearances in the films Irma La Douce and Everything You Always Wanted to Know About Sex (But Were Afraid to Ask), and TV's That Girl and The Man From U.N.C.L.E. Ten years ago, Jacobi was inducted into Canada's Walk of Fame.

Noa and Mira

Israeli Eurovision duo to perform at tribute dinner

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Noa and Mira, two singers who made international headlines when they presented a united Arab-Israeli front at this year's Eurovision Song Contest, will perform together for the first time in Canada.

On Nov. 15, Israel's leading international recording artist Achinoam Nini - known outside of Israel as Noa and Israeli-Arab singer, songwriter and actress Mira Awad will perform at the Partners for Peace Tribute Dinner. Hosted by the Canadian Friends of Haifa University (CFHU), the event takes place at the Fairmont Royal York in Toronto.

Dr. Michael Dan, a world-renowned neurosurgeon and biotechnologist, as well as a University of Haifa supporter, will be honoured with a doctor of philosophy degree and will be recognized for his role as a human rights and peace activist.

Noa, who often lends her talent to promote the cause of peace and coexistence, said she is "a great supporter of the work done in Haifa University, which is in keeping with my own values and dreams for the future of Israel."

But Noa, who has enjoyed a 20-year career and produced 10 albums with her musical partner, Gil Dor, said that promoting peace through her music was not always a priority.

"At the beginning of my career, I was focused solely on promoting my original music... But I quickly discovered that being from Israel was not like being from any other country, and I had not only the responsibility, but the opportunity to touch people's hearts and minds with words and actions promoting peace and coexistence," Noa said.

Over the years, Noa's career highlights include performing for former U.S. president Bill Clinton at the White House during an event honouring the late Israeli prime minister Yizhak Rabin, and being presented with the Dove of Peace award by Israeli President Shimon Peres.

Awad, who was born in Rama village in the Galilee to a Palestinian father and Bulgarian mother, said she was also eager to promote the message of peace and understanding at the CFHU tribute dinner.

"As long as the words 'partners' and 'peace' are involved, I am there," she said.

Awad has recorded theme songs for the movies Forgiveness, by director Udi Aloni, and Lemon Tree, by director Eran Riklis, and has appeared in movies and collaborated with several recording artists. She said her partnership with Noa began nine years ago.

Awad was invited to sing on Noa's album titled Now (2002), covering the Beatles' song, We Can Work It Out.

But it was their partnership last May for the Eurovision Song Contest, held in Moscow, that created the most international buzz for these Israeli artists.

When they decided to represent Israel together, with their entry titled There Must Be Another Way, they both hoped their original song, performed in Arabic, Hebrew and English, would open people up to the idea of coexistence.

"Many millions of people heard our song and internalized our message. We received thousands of letters from all over the world, including the Arab world – especially Iran – sharing enthusiasm and resonance with our ideas. It was very moving and made the whole experience worthwhile," Noa said.

While many embraced the partnership, Awad said that some were skeptical.

"I know that our partnership is no ploy, nor a PR stunt. I understand that some people think of it as such, but I believe these are people who haven't really been exposed to our work, and only react to the idea of it," Awad said.

"I can't say I was surprised [by the skepticism], since the announcement of our participation came in a very difficult and problematic time in Israel. On the background of the Gaza war, the collaboration between a Jewish and Arab artist seemed artificial and cynical. I understood where the criticism was coming from, but nevertheless I personally chose to stick to my belief in the necessity to keep the dialogue going, even in the hardest times," she added.

Noa said she hopes their message will be embraced by the Toronto Jewish community when they perform here.

"I hope they open their minds and hearts to the music, lyrics and ideas behind the songs, and realize, as we do, that there must be another way."

Awad added: "People living outside of the region tend to think of the situation in the Middle East in a very simplistic way.

"There are no good or bad people here, or right or wrong sides. Justice is a very subjective concept around here."

For more information about Noa, visit www.noasmusic.com.

Information about Awad, who just released her debut album titled Bahlawan in Israel, can be found at www.myspace.com/miraawad.

For tickets to the tribute dinner, call 416-972-9400.

Amanda Martinez's songwriting shows her growing confidence

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Latin jazz singer Amanda Martinez celebrated the release of her second album, Amor, with a lunchtime concert at First Canadian Place recently.

The concert, on Oct. 22, was more than a touch of karma for her, since this was the same place she made a momentous career-changing decision.

Eight years earlier, Martinez, an MBA grad, was taking a lunchtime break from her finance job at the downtown Toronto office tower, when she saw Amy Sky performing there for the Bay Street crowd. It was then that she realized the world of high finance wasn't for her and decided to pursue her musical dream.

"I still have vivid memories of that afternoon and meeting Amy Sky," Martinez, the Toronto-born daughter of a Mexican father and South African Jewish mother, says. "It really has come full circle now."

The afternoon spot was an event meant to promote her official CD launch in front of a sold-out crowd of 1,100 at the new Koerner Hall at the Royal Conservatory on Oct. 23.

That show also brought back memories for her. "I used to take my piano exams at the Conservatory, so I was always nervous in that building," she says. "I was worried that I'd be sick to my stomach, but that evening wasn't like that all."

The evening turned out to be a huge success. Internationally acclaimed flamenco guitarist Jesse Cook introduced the show, which featured a string section and two flamenco dancers. This was the largest show she's ever done.

"I always wanted to do a concert on that scale," she says. "It was a dream come true."

Martinez says that while the term "Latin Jazz" gives people an idea of what her music is like, it's somewhat misleading. "We started off as a Latin jazz band, but we now have lots of different influences. I have yet to come up with a new term to describe us," the former host of Café Latino on JAZZ FM91 says. "It's passionate Latin music with a lot of different influences."

Amor is Martinez's followup to her award-winning 2007 indie-release Sola, which sold more than 7,000 copies. As on Sola, she sings mostly in Spanish on songs that have a strong Cuban feel.

"Three of my musicians are from Cuba, so that definitely influences my sound. But that's also the music that gets into my blood. It's very upbeat and rhythmic," she says.

The 12 songs on the album, most of which are original compositions, display Martinez's versatility. While songs like Tomalo reflect these Cuban influences, Alma Mia, for example, betrays her Mexican upbringing with its fiesta-like atmosphere. Lupe's Song, the only one that contains English lyrics, is a beautiful ballad she wrote for a painter friend of hers who passed away.

Among the cover songs she does is Alcoba Azul. Lila Downs' song from the soundtrack of the movie Frida. Martinez's version, to my ears, has a subtle klezmer feel with its sad violin solo. "I always loved that song," Martinez says. "I've played that over and over again. It's always been a part of our repertoire."

Overall, her songwriting displays her maturity and growing confidence. It is definitely a step up from Sola, which won her multiple nominations at the National Jazz Awards and a Best World Music Artist trophy at Toronto's Independent Music Awards.

Amor has vibrant Afro-Cuban rhythms, soothing ballads and catchy, playful melodies.

"Amor has new influences and instruments that we didn't use last time, the cello in particular – I like that haunting sound – and the accordion. It's a fuller sounding album."

Amanda Martinez

The last couple years since Sola have been exciting for Martinez for personal reasons as well. Among the musicians in her new band is bassist Drew Birston, whom she met while putting her debut album together.

"We got married the next summer, and then last fall we had Leo [their son]." Most of the songs on Amor were written while she was pregnant. "Things happened really quickly. It all fell into place nicely."

Martinez plans on taking her one-year-old son on the road with her to places that will include Mexico and the Blue Note, the prestigious jazz club in New York.

"Leo is such an easygoing kid," she says. "He loves music and he loves people."

Martinez has also done some television acting. She was last seen on the Canadian series Regenesis, where she played a Zapatista rebel. She would like to combine her acting with her music, as she did on her video for the song Guajira Sola.

She is thrilled with the way things are going and has no regrets about her sudden career change all those years ago at First Canadian Place.

"Music allowed me to escape what I was doing before. It's a joy to perform, it's almost like a drug. I hope it never becomes a chore," she says. "If it ever does, I would stop."

Her music and videos, including Guajira Sola, are on her website at www.amandamartinez.ca.

My Mother's Lesbian Jewish Wiccan Wedding at Panasonic Theatre

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

My Mother's Lesbian Jewish Wiccan Wedding was a hit at the 2009 Toronto Fringe Festival.

As fate would have it, audience members included Mirvish Production staffers, who told David Mirvish about the show. Mirvish went to see the musical and was impressed.

As a result, Mirvish Productions has mounted an expanded and reworked production, which opens at Toronto's Panasonic Theatre for an open-ended run beginning Nov. 7.

"When members of my staff saw the very first performances of this hilarious and touching musical, they reported back to me with such enthusiasm that I even took my out-of-town guests to a performance," Mirvish says.

After seeing the show himself, Mirvish invited the show's writers, husband-and-wife team David Hein and Irene Carl Sankoff, to his boardroom. During the meeting with the theatre mogul, they discussed how they could expand the one-hour show to an hour and a half.

"At the performance we attended, the crowd went wild, and they had good reason to do so," Mirvish said. "It doesn't often happen that a show leaps straight from its Fringe beginnings and lands in the mainstream.

"The last time it happened was 10 years ago with a little show we discovered [also at the Toronto Fringe] called The Drowsy Chaperone, which we helped to develop over a workshop and several productions. And everyone knows what eventually happened with that show." It was a big hit in Toronto before opening on Broadway.

My Mother's Lesbian Jewish Wiccan Wedding is based on the true story of Hein's mother, who moved from the Prairies to Ontario and in the process discovered her sexuality and rediscovered her Judaism.

"It is about her coming out to me as a lesbian and a Jew," Hein says. "She never practised Judaism before, so we never celebrated holidays or went to temple when I was growing up. In the play and in life, there was a specific moment that she told me she was going to a synagogue, singing in a Jewish choir and learning Hebrew."

Hein is an award-winning singer-songwriter and actor, who plays himself in the production and also serves as the musical director.

He's been married to Sankoff, an actor, for eight years. Sankoff also performs in My Mother's Lesbian Jewish Wiccan Wedding, playing Michelle, a young lesbian and confidante of Hein's mom, as she is making her way from her old life and rediscovering herself.

In the play, as in real life, Hein introduced Sankoff to both his mothers at Hooters. One of the songs Hein wrote for the play is called Don't Take Your Lesbian Moms to Hooters.

In the show, Sankoff is played by Lori Nancy Kalamanski. Shaw and Stratford Festival veteran, Lisa Horner, plays Hein's mother.

The new production of My Mother's Lesbian Jewish Wiccan Wedding, directed by Andrew Lamb, allows for a bigger cast, crew and band, as well as better lighting and costumes than the Fringe production. Hein also wrote more songs for it.

Hein says that the association with Mirvish has allowed them to amp it up and take the show to the next level.

Sankoff says that with the longer format, the story has a lot more breathing space. "Now we can visit some of the themes that were in the first production more closely and find out about who the background characters are. We now have more space onstage, so before dance numbers were sort of suggested, and now they're able to take a life of their own."

Hein says: "At the end of the day, it is really a beautiful love story about one person falling in love with someone else. I think in the play there is something for everyone who has ever fallen in love. It is a great show for parents and kids."

Sankoff adds: "It is about respecting other people's faith and sexual orientation, and about how we are all the same on the inside, with the same desires, and that we all want to fall in love and want to have families and to be able to express who we are."

Tickets are available at the Panasonic Theatre box office or by phone at 416-872-1212, or toll-free, at 1-800-461-3333. For more information, visit www.mirvish.com.

Is the Jewish-style delicatessen dying?

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Thirty-four pages into his delicious primer on Jewish-style delicatessens, Save the Deli (McClelland & Stewart), David Sax drops a bombshell: "In 50 years' time, it is possible that no delis will exist at all in New York City."

Sax, a Toronto-born writer who lives in Brooklyn, is not kidding.

Consider the grim numbers. In 1931, New York City, the incubator of the deli as we know it today, was home to 1,550 kosher delis. Nearly 80 years on, he claims, no more than a few dozen remain.

What happened?

"For New York's delicatessens, rent and property values are what ultimately dictate life and death," he says. "Those who can pay survive. Those who cannot will close."

Another factor is also at play here. Profit margins are down due to the rapidly rising cost of deli meats. Once, they were cheaply priced. No longer, now that the price of cattle feed has increased tremendously.

As a result, Sax says, New York's Jewish delis have found themselves "sandwiched" between skyrocketing rents, astronomical food costs and a customer base unwilling to pay more.

Changing eating habits have had an impact as well. As he puts it, "Today's Jewish youth are far less likely to eat at a delicatessen than their parents."

In short, the new generation has ditched smoked meat and pastrami sandwiches for burgers, barbecue and Israeli Middle Eastern fare, which is lower in saturated fat, salt and preservatives.

These trends notwithstanding, Sax has a soft spot for delis. "In delis, people see life. They see hope. They smell comfort."

A case in point: New Yorkers flocked to delis after the Arab terrorist attacks in Manhattan on Sept. 11, 2001. "The world they'd known was literally tumbling down, and their first reaction was to seek out the comforting certainty of matzah ball soup and cabbage rolls. In delis, New Yorkers taste love."

Elaborating on this theme, Sax writes that delis are not restaurants per se, but "places to exchange ideas and gossip, cut deals, network and ruminate on the lessons of life."

Although Save the Deli is sometimes a lament on its decline and future, it is ultimately a paean to the eclectic mix of gastronomic delights that gourmets and gourmands alike can find in a decent delicatessen worth its salt.

Sax, having been practically raised in delis, lists the classic menu items: The aromatic corned beef. The peppery pastrami. The braised brisket. The garlicky salami. The silken tongue. The steaming bowls of chicken soup. The knishes, kishke, kasha, varnishkes, kreplach and kugel. The rye bread. The garlic-soaked pickles. The mustard, whether yellow or brown, since butter and mayonnaise are virtually forbidden in old-fashioned delicatessens.

According to Sax, the first delis in New York City were likely German-owned, since Germans gravitated toward specialties such as sausages, sauerkraut, meatloaf, frankfurters and liverwurst. Jews, particularly German Jews, were not far behind.

"The first big name in American Jewish deli was that of Isaac Gellis, a Berlin-born sausage maker who came to New York in 1871… and quickly established himself in the Lower East Side," he writes. Gellis was soon America's biggest purveyor of kosher hot dogs, sausages, salamis and cold cuts. But Sussman Volk, a Lithuanian Jewish butcher who arrived in the United States in 1887, may have been the first person in New York City to sell a pastrami sandwich.

Delis at the turn of the 19th century followed a simple formula, Sax says. They were largely found in the Lower East Side, where the Jewish population was concentrated. They were almost uniformly kosher, and they served a limited selection of food: corned beef, pastrami and pickled tongue, followed closely by roast brisket, beef salami and beef baloney.

Delicacies such as lox, bagels and cream cheese were sold in dairy shops dispensing smoked fish.

Having travelled across the United States and Canada to research this illuminating and entertaining book, Sax concludes that many of the finest delis he had the pleasure of visiting have been passed on from one generation to the next. "When you have children, parents and grandparents all putting in their two cents, the compromises that emerge leave stronger delis in their wake," he observes.

One such deli is Langer's in downtown Los Angeles. You may be surprised that Los Angeles has become "America's premier deli city." Sax believe there are more delis of higher quality there than in New York City. Citing delis like Factor's and Nate n' Al, he says, "There has been no grand decline in the Los Angeles deli scene."

As for New York, Sax cites a litany of reputable delis, including Katz's – the last original and oldest delicatessen on the Lower East Side – where most of the countermen hail from the Dominican Republic or Puerto Rico. Sax also has words of praise for Gottlieb's in Brooklyn, which serves a strictly Orthodox Jewish clientele and where the lingua franca is Yiddish.

As well, Sax admires Zingerman's in Ann Arbor, Mich., a small deli that evolved into an exquisite food emporium on a par with Zabar's in Manhattan.

Moving southward, he lists a plethora of delis in southern Florida, whose Jewish population has exploded in the past 25 years.

He is crushed by the news that Rascal House, one of the great temples of deli fare, has been torn down and replaced by a condominium. Describing it as "the most famous deli south of New York," Sax notes that no visit to Florida was ever complete without a visit to Rascal House. "During peak tourist season, crowds would line up from breakfast until four in the morning."

I confess I was a fan, too.

Sax states that traditional delis like Rascal House have been supplanted by "corporate delis" such as Toojay's Original Gourmet Deli, which began as a single operation in Palm Beach and has expanded into a chain of 25 restaurants with more than 1,700 employees.

For Sax, Montreal remains the "nirvana" of deli purists.

"Montreal delis have remained stubbornly original in their decor, food preparation and menus," he writes, mentioning Schwartz's Montreal Hebrew Delicatessen and its heavenly smoked meat sandwich.

As for Toronto, Sax is worried about the flurry of deli closings. "Today, roughly half a dozen Jewish delicatessens exist in Toronto, down from several dozen a few decades ago."

But Sax has a high opinion of Centre Street Deli, where "the food is always on the mark." I can attest to that, having happily feasted on its glorious hand-cut smoked meat and pastrami sandwiches.

Sax is disappointed that Israelis have not taken to the deli. "The Israeli culinary landscape is dominated by the food of the Arabs. Hummus is everywhere, as is falafel, but searching for a knish in Israel is like trying to work out a peace deal in the region… heartbreaking, exhausting, and destined for failure."

No wonder aliyah from North America remains abysmally low.

Wise and hilarious,
the principles outlined here will work for anyone who makes the effort to put them into practice.

Author Michael Wex beats the drum for his mamaloshen

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Michael Wex is a member of a very exclusive club.

He's a professional Yiddishist.

"It's a fairly specialized field, I guess," he said, resorting to understatement

Wex, 55, earns a living extolling, promoting and nurturing the virtues of Yiddish language and culture through the medium of books, plays, translations, storytelling and lectures.

As he freely admits, he's one of the very few people on this planet who's dedicated to this rather arcane pursuit on a fulltime basis.

Wex, who began his career as a medievalist specializing in Middle English and Old Norse, spends many of his waking hours popularizing Yiddish, a supposedly moribund language whose demise has been predicted time and time again.

Michael Wex. [Sheldon Kirshner photo]

For the past 25 years, he has beat the drums for his beloved mamaloshen through fiction and nonfiction (Shlepping the Exile and Born to Kvetch: Yiddish Language and Culture in All of Its Moods), one-person plays (Sex in Yiddish and God in Paris), translations of the novels of Yiddish greats Shalom Aleichem and I.L. Peretz into English, readings from his own works, and talks at synagogues, Jewish community centres, universities and academic conferences.

Wex has also translated Bertold Brecht's The Three Penny Opera into Yiddish, transcribed the songs of Irving Berlin and Bob Dylan into Yiddish and taught Yiddish at the University of Toronto and the University of Michigan.

Two months ago, the publisher Alfred A. Knopf Canada officially launched Wex's latest work, How to Be a Mentsh (& Not a Shmuck), a witty and erudite blueprint for living a decent, moral and reasonably happy life.

At Toronto's annual Jewish Book Fair late last month, Wex, a scholar and a comic, read excerpts and took questions. The book draws on current events, pop culture, Yiddish proverbs, talmudic wisdom and Jewish tradition to advise readers how to lead a contented, dignified life.

By his definition, you're a shmuck if you rely on a life coach instead of your own conscience, or if you always blame someone else for your shortcomings.

You're a mensch if you cut everybody the same slack as you cut for yourself, or you do the right thing, even when no one is looking or will ever know.

Two separate events inspired him to write How to Be a Mentsh (& Not a Shmuck).

He was sitting in a restaurant with his editor when a person spilled coffee on their table and just walked away without bothering to apologize. Wex was rankled by the boorish behaviour.

Wex was also appalled when Eliot Spitzer, the governor of New York state, brazenly appropriated his best friend's identity after being arrested in a prostitution scandal that ultimately cost him his job. "He was a shmuck," said Wex. "What kind of a guy is this? So I started to think: who is a shmuck?"

Being a realist, Wex believes that no one is perfect. Indeed, there is not a single person who has not behaved badly. But in general, people tend to be menschen. "You're doing fairly well if you can live up to that ideal most of the time," he said.

Much to his delight, How to Be a Mentsh has attained the status of a bestseller, like Born to Kvetch, which sold about 200,000 copies in hardback and softcover editions in Canada and the United States.

Born to Kvetch, a treatise on how the Jewish worldview is reflected in Yiddish, was personally lucrative. Asked to elaborate, he replied, "Not bad. It was better than a kick in the pants."

Born in Lethbridge, Alta., he is the scion of Polish Jews who immigrated to Canada before World War II.

At home, he communicated in Yiddish with his parents, Louis and Lola, who ran a furniture store that had been established by his grandfather, Moshe, who came to Canada in the 1920s.

About 90 Jewish families, the majority originally from eastern Europe, lived in Lethbridge when Wex was a boy. "There was a community, a shul," he said. "Nearly everyone spoke Yiddish."

When he was six, his parents moved to Calgary and then to Toronto, where he was essentially raised.

Wex studied English literature at the University of Toronto, completing BA and MA degrees while immersing himself in medieval literature, which was both foreign and familiar to him.

"Middle English and Old Norse are really old Germanic languages related to Yiddish linguistically. You can recognize verb roots."

Hoping to become a professor, Wex embarked on the PhD program, intent on submitting a thesis on 14th-century English poetry. But when he realized there were no openings in the field, he rapidly lost interest in his dissertation, drifted into Yiddish and became a major figure in its current revival.

"Yiddish is the only dying language I've heard of that has an increasing number of speakers every year," he said in a reference to chassidic Jews, who have an uncommonly high birthrate.

Apart from chassidim, Yiddish is also used by the dwindling band of Holocaust survivors, he noted.

Surprisingly enough, at least as far as he is concerned, Yiddish has been helped along by academia in Canada and the United States.

"It has found a new home at universities," he said, referring to the proliferation of Yiddish departments in recent years. "It's a development that once seemed unimaginable."

Although he has no idea how many Yiddish speakers there are in Canada or the United States, it is increasingly difficult for him to find kindred spirits with whom he can carry on conversations about everyday topics in Yiddish.

As he put it, "There are a couple of people, roughly my own age, who can speak Yiddish."

In the past, however, he has encountered scores of fellow Yidddish speakers at KlezKamp, an upstate New York facility that has promoted Yiddish and Yiddish culture in all its permutations since the mid-1980s.

Currently, Wex is finishing his third novel, the working title of which is The Frumkiss Family Business. Set to be published in the autumn of 2010, it will follow on the heels of The Adventures of Micah Mushmelon, Boy Talmudist, which came out two years ago.

Much to his surprise, Wex has discovered that he has a broad-based readership. "It's not entirely Jewish by a long shot."

Judging by readers' mail, he has learned that some of his most loyal fans are non-Jews who are married to Jews and read his books to upgrade their evolving knowledge of their spouses' Jewish background.

Children's entertainers Sonshine & Broccoli to launch new CD

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

"Strap on that guitar/ Strum a little beat/ Let your hands go crazy/ And stomp your feet/ It's the Broccoli Jam!"

Singing along with children's entertainers Sonshine & Broccoli is fun for kids and the young at heart. Playing together for six years now, Lisa Sonshine and Brock Burford are known by fans for their catchy nicknames, creative lyrics, rocking tunes and energy.

"Lisa has always been called Sonshine, and I have always been called Broccoli," says Burford. "It just goes together. Sunshine makes broccoli grow!"

Sonshine & Broccoli is set to release their second CD, Feel the Beat, at a concert at 3:30 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre in the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre on Nov. 22.

"[Feel the Beat] is the real deal," said Burford. "We now have a drummer, a bass player, a fiddle player and a flute, whereas [on our debut] it was just guitar. We're taking it to the next level."

The duo met at Sheridan College, where they were both enrolled in a musical theatre program. They bonded over their common interests and quickly became the best of friends. When Sonshine's aunt suggested she use her talent to start a sing-along group for children, Sonshine said it was only natural for her to turn to Burford for help.

"In the beginning, we did circle sing-along groups with about eight to 10 kids in a parent's basement," said Sonshine. "It was very interactive and full of movement. Things just grew from there, a crazy domino effect that became our full-time job."

Sonshine and Broccoli released Sonshine & Broccoli Jam, their debut album, in 2007. The 12 songs were written by the partners in coffee shops and on subways. Each song has a different theme – from playing dress-up and the environment to working as a team.

Sonshine said her two passions in life have always been kids and music, so putting the album together was an easy process. "To get into the mind of a kid and be a child again is so thrilling. I wish I was three and could get excited about something as simple as seeing a fire truck drive by!"

Sonshine & Broccoli launched their first CD two years ago on Israel Day at Mel Lastman Square. "We had no idea what to expect, and it was unbelievable. The people just went nuts," said Sonshine. The concert was such a hit that the duo have since performed all over the city, at many events, and for many causes.

"We had a concert last year at Beth David, a Chanukah concert last winter at the Leah Posluns Theatre, we branched out to Regent Park for Fun Day this year, and the list goes on," said Sonshine. "We perform at a lot of schools, including underprivileged schools where the children would not normally be exposed to our kind of music. It's very rewarding, and we now have very dedicated followers!"

Aside from being successful at a job they adore, Sonshine and Burford said they are most delighted at witnessing the joy that their fans experience through their music. "These young boys come out to our shows and know all the words to Broccoli Jam. It's mind-blowing! Their parents say they're so shy in school, and then they transform into mini rock stars belting out the lyrics! They line up beside me holding their little red guitars, like I'm their role model. It's adorable," Burford said.

Sonshine said parents are constantly approaching her and Burford with positive feedback and words of encouragement. "They come up to us every day and say things like, 'If your CD is not in the car, my kid won't get in' or, 'They won't go to bed if you're not playing at night.'"

Sonshine said parents have even admitted to her that they continue listening to the CD when their kids have left the car. "The dads love it because it's very musical – thanks to Brock, with his guitar-playing skills and rock 'n' roll edge. The moms love it because they like hearing good vocals, my Broadway-style voice."

Tickets for their CD launch concert can be purchased by calling 416-924-6211, ext. 0.

Vancouver exhibit showcases 1936 Olympics

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — As momentum for the 2010 Winter Olympics began to build to a crescendo, Frieda Miller found herself wondering about past Olympic games – and one in particular.

In 1936 the summer and winter Olympics were held in Nazi Germany and Canada was an avid participant.

"The '36 games represented one of the first points of contact between Canada and the Nazi state," said Miller, executive director of the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre. "It was a critical juncture between the building of a Nazi racial state and the Holocaust."

Miller decided the subject warranted further research and solicited the help of Richard Menkis, an assistant professor at the University of British Columbia, and Harold Troper, a professor at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education at the University of Toronto. Both have a special interest in Canadian Jewish history, and both were eager to lend their research skills to this project.

Their investigation culminated in an exhibition titled "More Than Just Games: Canada and the 1936 Olympics," which will be displayed at the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre until June 18. The exhibit recounts the public debate that swirled around Canada's participation in the 1936 Olympics, how Canada interacted with the Nazis, how the Nazis turned the Games into a successful exercise in public relations and why an attempt by Canadians to get their country to boycott the '36 Games failed.

"We knew Canada was one of more than 40 countries that sent a team to the 1936 Olympics," said Troper. "But as Richard and I started piecing together the history of Canada in the 1936 Olympics, we had no idea what we were getting into and what we would find. The story we unearthed turned out to be more interesting and darkly disturbing than we could have imagined."

The exhibit personalizes the 1936 Olympics by giving viewers a perspective on some of the Canadian athletes who were eligible to participate. There was Sammy Luftspring, a Toronto boxer, and high jumper Eva Dawes, both of whom chose not to participate in the Games.

Frieda Miller stands beside a display at the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre.

Windsor's Irving (Toots) Meretsky was the only Jew on Canada's basketball team, and his decision to join the team in Nazi Germany is discussed, too. When his team members received silver medals, Meretsky was the only one to return home empty-handed. (Many years later, just before he died, he was finally given a silver medal.)

When they interviewed Meretsky's family members, Menkis and Troper learned that the young basketball player from Windsor had visited members of Germany's Jewish community while he was in the country and had noted how fearful they seemed at the time.

But the Nazis did a splendid job of hiding anti-Semitism and toning down their rhetoric while international eyes were on their country. They knew this was a PR opportunity not to be missed, and they used it to their full advantage.

Matthew Halten, then a young journalist who covered Nazi Germany and the 1936 Olympics for the Toronto Star, interviewed one of the Canadian skaters while she was at the Winter Games. "No people as courteous as these could persecute the Jews or militarize their whole country," she told him.

Halten's son, David, who is compiling a biography about his father, spoke to an audience of 150 at the exhibit's launch at the Vancouver Jewish Community Centre. "My father played an extraordinary role in the 1930s in sounding the alarm about what was going on in Nazi Germany," he said. "His dispatches were very far-sighted, and unlike many of his journalistic colleagues, he saw German anti-Semitism at the core of Nazi ideology."

David Halten noted that many Berlin-based foreign correspondents were quiescent about the Nazi regime and self-censored their reporting to avoid jeopardizing their positions. The Nazis enabled journalistic self-censorship by showering them with favours, like beer clubs, access to a foreign press club and a chance to treble their salaries.

Did it work? By and large, yes. The exhibition text notes that Canadian athletes and much of the Canadian press reported that the Germans were exceptional hosts at the '36 Olympics.

The images on display in the exhibition are thought-provoking and enlightening. We see smiling Canadian athletes jostling to get autographs from Hitler and propaganda minister Joseph Goebbels. In one image, a parade of Canadian athletes has their arms outstretched in the traditional Olympic salute. The gesture, however, looks eerily similar to the Nazi salute.

"This exhibit is so timely and useful," Halten said. "It reminds us that on one singular occasion, this great sporting institution was perverted and exploited for the most cynical and evil of purposes."

Credit for mounting the exhibit goes first and foremost to Miller, Troper said. "She recognized the upcoming Olympics as a unique teaching moment to educate us about another Olympics that occurred as Germany was plotting its expansion across Europe."

The collaborative efforts of this research and the exhibition bring to the fore a number of questions that have, until now, lain dormant and largely forgotten. Why did Canada participate? Why did our country look the other way as the Nazis made a mockery of the Olympic ideal? And what do these games reveal about the relationship between politics and sport?

To ponder the answers to these questions, visit the exhibition between now and June 18 at the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre. For more information, visit www.vhec.org.

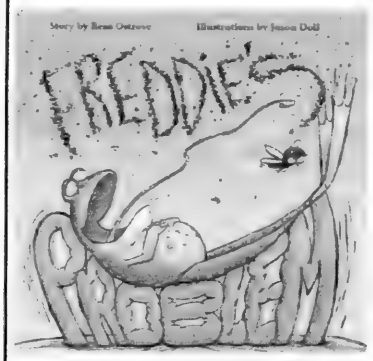
Retired teacher renews career as an author

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Having retired last June after 29 years of teaching in the Jewish school system, Resa Ostrove is moving ahead with a new career as an author.

In late September, the retired Ramah Talmud Torah/Gray Academy elementary school teacher, had a book launch at McNally Robinson's Polo Park outlet in Winnipeg, for her children's book, Freddie's Problem, a beautifully illustrated, 32-page book about a frog who has eaten too many flies and has a terrible stomach ache as a result.

The story follows Freddie as he goes to each of his friends to ask their advice on how to cure his stomach complaint.



Ostrove is confident that the book will appeal to parents as well as their children.

Although Ostrove worked intensively on her story from the beginning of the year to finalize it for publication, she says that she actually wrote the first draft 23 years ago.

"I made up the story for my son, Zack, as a bedtime story. He loved it and I had to tell it to him over and over again. I told it to some teaching colleagues who encouraged me to write it down."

She tried unsuccessfully to get Freddie's Problem published 23 years ago, then put it aside.

"I was busy raising young children and pursuing a career in teaching, for which I always had a strong passion," she says.

In recent years, Ostrove has written other works, in particular, a series she calls The Grandmother Tales, comprised of fairy tales and folk tales (which has yet to be published.) "I was raised on folk and fairy tales. I really loved them."

Freddie's Problem was published by Peanut Butter Press, a small Winnipeg publisher, and illustrated by Jason Doll. There were 5,000 copies in the initial printing.

"We sold 90 copies at the launch. We had an enormous number of people [there.]

"I hope everyone falls in love with Freddie," Ostrove says.

REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

WORKMEN'S CIRCLE 100 YEARS OLD

This group photo from 1911 shows the first teachers of the Jewish National Radical School of Toronto, a secular institution under the guidance of labour leader Isaac Matenko and writer Abraham Rhinewine. Several years later, it modified its radical spirit and changed its name to the Workmen's Circle Peretz School in honour of the great Yiddish writer Y. L. Peretz. This month, on Nov. 14 and 15, the Toronto Workmen's Circle commemorates its 100th anniversary with the re-creation of a Yiddish Radio Show, a brunch, alumni reunion and concert.

Bullying must be addressed

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Dear Jewish day school principals, teachers, boards and parents:

The Toronto Jewish community is fortunate to have a vibrant day school system. Like all institutions, though, there are some cracks.

Too many of our day school children are suffering at the hands of bullies. Far too many of our children are allowed to abuse other children. One child being bullied and one bully in our community is too many. They need our guidance and help.

URBAN WRITER

It's cause for great concern that Jewish children are able to act violently or abusively toward others. We are not a violent people. In fact, the Torah we teach in our schools – in those courses we pay handily for – are predicated on kavod – respect.

Where are our children learning this aggressive and insensitive behaviour?

While I know there are schools that have invited in such organizations as LOVE (Leave Out Violence, www.leaveoutviolence.com), more needs to be done to educate our community on the long- and short-term pain that bullying causes.

I have been told that bullying is ingrained very deeply in our schools, and it's often unrecognizable to parents, teachers and principals. Your child/student might be afraid to tell you that he or she is being bullied or is a bully.

Parents from day schools of all denominations have told me that children are often poorly supervised in the schoolyard and lunchroom. This creates an environment in which organized and informal bullying takes place. The law of the brute is able to prevail.

Some parents say that teachers deal reactively and randomly with violent situations in the schoolyard. The students might be warned to behave, but then return to their nasty behaviour. The bully might get reprimanded, but their mean-spiritedness isn't dealt with and their hurtful and abusive character remains intact.

"It's really every family and kid for themselves," one parent told me.

Our community is much more aware of bullying in our day schools than ever before. The Jewish Family & Child is helping to stymie the problem in schools by training social workers to detect bullying, and to recognize and help both the bullied and the bullies. The agency is educating our principals, teachers and students on the destructiveness of all types of bullying, including cyber-bullying. (Imagine your child being e-labelled for all to see: "The biggest geek in the school." Yes, you should cry for that child.) "We're doing our part and must remain vigilant to sustain our efforts," JF&CS' executive director, Richard Cummings, said.

We need to hold ourselves, our schools and our children to a high standard of decency, tolerance and respect. That's the only reason Jewish schooling exists.

Do some research:

• Principals: Read www.bullyingawarenessweek.org (Nov. 15 – 21) and sponsor bullying education in your schools.

• Boards: Request a cross-community committee to determine the level of bullying in our schools and ways of squelching it.

• Parents: Ask for regular workshops through LOVE and other organizations. Demand a greater emphasis on courses that focus on human decency and interaction.

• Parents: Teach your children to stick up for themselves and others.

• Parents: Teach and show your children, if they are bullying others, to be gentle.

• Rabbis: Speak and write about bullying and kavod from your pulpits and in your newsletters.

The Torah has its bullies. Read about them at http://www.blognow.com.au/rabbiofoz/73233/Bible_Bullies.html. Cain bullied Abel, and Joseph was bullied by his brothers. Let's study these stories to learn how not to behave.

The bullied and the bullies await our action.

B'shalom,
Once bullied,
Avrum

P.S. Bullied or bullies, contact me confidentially at my blog, http://avrum.net. Tell me your story. Our community needs to hear it.

Help give a brand new life a better start.

Leaders focus on youth at GA

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON D.C. — The organized Jewish community must help Jewish youth build a strong bond with Israel, and in the process with the wider Jewish world, says Joe Kanfer, chair of the Jewish Federations of North America's board of trustees.

"We must commit more fully… to connect young Jews with Israel. We can answer for these young people the question… 'Why be Jewish?'" Kanfer said Sunday in his speech at the organization's general assembly (GA), which was held this year in Washington, D.C.

Joe Kanfer

Kanfer's message about young people was part of his larger one about Jewish unity.

"Think of how we pray. Not alone, but in millions," Kanfer said. "We've come together again and again through the years in historic moments of challenge, to rescue, build and rebuild the Jewish People."

Phil Birnbaum, a member of Hillel in Toronto, already knows the answer to the question of "Why be Jewish?"

For Birnbaum, 18, being Jewish is about refusing to shrug off challenges facing the community. And more importantly, it's about being aware of these challenges.

"Apathy is one of the biggest issues in the Jewish community," he said. "[Apathy] is not knowing about the issues and just sort of shrugging it off."

Birnbaum, a York University student, said the GA is an opportunity for Jewish youth to be heard.

"We're here, saying, 'Here's what we think.' We can come and speak up [at the GA], we're kind of on an equal footing," he said.

This year, about 3,500 people were expected to participate in the assembly, held Nov. 8 to 10, for three days of workshops, speakers, forums and a film festival.

While many of the forums focused on current Jewish issues such as North American philanthropy and effective Jewish leadership, others centred on Jewish students and young professionals.

Help Israeli Arabs, Reform Jews urge

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Israel has to change the way it treats its Arab citizens and the haredim, allocating resources more equitably to the former and having the latter "go back to work," Knesset member Avishay Braverman, Israel's minister of minority affairs, said at the opening evening plenary of the Union for Reform Judaism's (URJ) 70th biennial convention last week.

Embracing Israeli Arabs is not only moral, it's wise, Braverman stressed. If not, he said, they'll become fundamentalist at some point.

About 3,500 delegates from the United States, Canada and eight other countries filled the Metro Toronto Convention Centre Nov. 4 to 8 to hear Braverman and other prominent speakers, and to learn, pray, sing, study and shmooze. It was the first time in 30 years the convention has been held in Canada. It also took place in Toronto in 1979.

Academic Giant Dies

PARIS — Claude Levi-Strauss, considered to be the father of modern anthropology, died Oct. 30 in Paris at age 100. He introduced the concept of structuralism, the finding of common patterns of thought and behaviour in different human societies and activities, to the field of anthropology. Born in Brussels to an artistic French-Jewish family, Levi-Strauss grew up near Versailles, where his grandfather was a rabbi. He studied in Paris but left France after the introduction of the Vichy regime's anti-Jewish laws. He fought with the Free French Forces in World War II. Levi-Strauss went on to teach at universities in Paris, New York and Sao Paulo, and was the author of several significant books on anthropology.

Unionist Backs Israel

WASHINGTON — The new president of the AFL-CIO rejected boycotting Israel. The 11.5-million-member labour union is "proud to stand with the JLC to oppose boycotting Israel," Richard Trumka told the Jewish Labor Committee at its annual Human Rights Dinner on Oct. 27. Trumka also spoke out against both anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism. "In America, we sometimes think that anti-Semitism is part of the past, but the truth is that it's like a weed that can always grow back," he said. "And that's especially true during hard times. You know, sometimes it's couched as 'anti-Zionism.' Other times there's no effort to disguise it at all." He added that "the Jewish community ... has never had a stronger ally than the AFL-CIO," and he expressed support for U.S. President Barack Obama's Mideast "peace initiative."

Nazi Imagery Decried

WASHINGTON — More than 300 Conservative rabbis signed a statement urging Americans to renounce the use of Nazi imagery in political discourse. The Conservative movement's Rabbinical Assembly issued a statement noting recent examples of public figures using such rhetoric, including Southern Baptist Convention leader Rev. Dr. Richard Land calling U.S. health-care reform proposals "what the Nazis did" and U.S. Rep. Alan Grayson (D-Fla.) calling the current U.S. health-care system a "holocaust in America." Such rhetoric has a "chilling effect on people of conscience who find the appropriation of such imagery to be disrespectful of the victims and reinforcing of the politics of personal attack that has damaged public discourse in the United States," the rabbis said.

Jewish Club Closes

SYDNEY, Australia — The Hakoah Club, the social, cultural and sports hub of Sydney Jewry, has closed after more than 30 years. Facing mounting debts and dwindling membership, the four-storey institution shut down Nov. 5. Its president said the club, an integral part of Jewish life in Sydney since it was built by Westfield Group chief Frank Lowy in 1975, was "bleeding to death." In its heyday, it was where local Jews, many of them Holocaust survivors like Lowy, celebrated bar mitzvahs and weddings, danced and played games and sports.

Canada Starts Representing Israel

CARACAS — The Canadian Embassy in Caracas has begun representing Israel's diplomatic and consular interests in Venezuela.

Venezuela expelled the Israeli ambassador and embassy staff, and severed relations with the Jewish state last January in protest of the war in Gaza.

In addition to relaying diplomatic communications between Israel and Venezuela, Canada will also provide consular services to Israeli citizens or travellers to Israel, the Canadian Embassy's press office said Nov. 4.

Consular services include issuing visas for Venezuelan citizens seeking to travel to Israel and accepting passport and residency applications. Since January, Venezuelan Jews lacking Israeli passports had to travel to either Bogota, Colombia or Miami to request a visa.

Anecdotally, Venezuelan Jews said recently it seems Venezuela has stopped issuing visas for Israelis seeking to visit the South American nation.

President Hugo Chavez has adopted an unequivocally strident tone against Israel, often equating it with his other foe, the United States, while forging warm ties with countries such as Iran and Libya. Earlier this year, Chavez told Al Jazeera there were no plans to resume direct ties with Israel until it reconsidered its "genocidal attitude."

Venezuelan Foreign Ministry representatives were unavailable for comment to JTA.

Bronfman teaching philanthropy to next gen

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Charles Bronfman believes the future of Jewish philanthropy is in good hands.

The chairman of the New York-based Andrea and Charles Bronfman Philanthropies (ACBP) – creator of the successful Birthright Israel program and funder to a vast array of Jewish and secular charities – likes what he sees in the next generation of Jewish leaders and philanthropists.

Bronfman and his organization's president, Jeffrey Solomon, recently co-authored a book about what they term the "new philanthropy." In it, they discuss how generations X and Y are taking over from the boomers and traditionalists, and re-engineering traditional models of giving by making them relevant in today's world.

Titled The Art of Giving: Where the Soul Meets a Business Plan (Jossey-Bass 2009), the book discusses the mechanics of how a person can best go about giving. Bronfman and Solomon provide numerous examples and case studies, and call on non-profits in North America to start thinking in business terms to help provide a better return-on-investment for donors and their clients.

The book is a fascinating read and provides insight into the mind of one of the world's richest men and how his philosophy of giving affects millions worldwide and how he is intent on promoting Jewish continuity from generation to generation.

Speaking to The CJN last week from New York, Bronfman and Solomon discussed the future of Jewish philanthropy and how they intend to pass the torch to the community's youth.

"I think generations X and Y want to follow their money. They're very spiritual and not associated a lot with organized Jewish philanthropy or institutions the way we or our parents were," Bronfman said. "Many of the [Jewish] federations are traditionalist. The ACBP is traditionalist… and yet we all have programs that are catering to the [next generations.] Even though I may not totally understand them, I have a lot of empathy for them."

Charles Bronfman

When asked if he was worried that Jewish youth in North America might tend to shy away from funding traditional Jewish charities or causes, Bronfman was sanguine.

"We take the attitude that Jewish values are Jewish values. As long as you use them in what you're doing [philanthropically], it really doesn't matter. If you take the environment, for example, there's a heck of a lot in the Bible about the environment. And certainly on Birthright trips, many of the participants are terribly interested in what the Israelis are doing. But this is all part of the new scenery in the society in which we're living," he said.

Current ancient wisdom

From the editor's desk...

It is an oft-repeated conceit of the modern human being to disparage ancient wisdom. It is an oft-noticed, sad phenomenon of the modern Jew that we have become increasingly unaware of much of our own ancient wisdom.

As we "advance" more deeply into modernity's all-encompassing, technological matrix, some of us have moved away from the texts and traditions that brought us this far as a distinct people some 35 generations removed-but-still-connected to our first great master, Moses.

For anyone wishing to become reacquainted with some aspects of our ancient wisdom, even if at the margins, or to test the relevance of "yesterday's" lessons to today's challenges, I recommend a new publication by Rabbi Jonathan Sacks.

Maggid Books, an affiliate of Koren Publishers Jerusalem in co-operation with the Orthodox Union, has just published the first of five planned volumes of Covenant & Conversation: A Weekly Reading of the Jewish Bible. The first volume deals with the weekly portions from the Book of Genesis and is titled, appropriately, The Book of Beginnings.

As readers of The CJN have read in this column before, Rabbi Sacks' uniquely insightful offerings from the limitless storehouse of Jewish "literature" and scholarship is matched in a beautiful harmony by his uniquely elegant manner of writing.

His writing can be read wholeheartedly by Jews of all affiliations. It is quite inspiring.

In Covenant & Conversation, Rabbi Sacks' broad purpose is to show that the stories of the Torah, the Five Books of Moses, can be applied in our age and time, even as they were also applied in times long before us.

"If there is one shared feature of these essays," Rabbi Sacks writes, "it is that I have tried to set the biblical text in the wider context of ideas... I have tried to look at [Torah] through a telescope: the larger picture and its place in the constellation of concepts that make Judaism so compelling a picture of the universe and our place within it."

Rabbi Sacks is adamant that each one of us can, indeed, must endeavour to make the Torah our own, must find in it the timelessness that makes it belong to our own as well as our many bygone eras. "Every age has added its commentaries and so must ours," Rabbi Sacks declares.

Each weekly portion contains a number of short discussions, or "conversations." For example, in this week's Torah portion, Chayei Sarah, Rabbi Sacks delivers four short discourses on four very different insights that he gleans from the text. In each essay, the rabbi's conclusions are remarkable for their immediate importance in our own lives. I highlight merely one of the refractions of the vast light that shines from each essay.

The first "conversation" is about Land and Children. Rabbi Sacks writes "A land: Israel. And children: Jewish continuity. The astonishing fact is that today, 4,000 years later, they remain the dominant concerns of Jews throughout the world – the safety and security of Israel as the Jewish home and the future of the Jewish people. Abraham's hopes and fears are ours.

"Now as then, the divine promise does not mean that we can leave the future to God. That idea has no place in the imaginative world of the first book of the Torah. On the contrary: the covenant is God's challenge to us, not ours to God. The meaning of the events of Chayei Sarah is that Abraham realized that God was depending on him. Faith does not mean passivity. It means the courage to act and never to be deterred. The future will happen, but it is we – inspired, empowered, given strength by the promise – who must bring it about."

In the essay Prayer and Conversation, Rabbi Sacks suggests that "in a real sense, in prayer we do not simply speak; we are spoken. God, and the traditions of Jewish faith speak through us. The very words we use are not our own, but those of thousands of years of our people's history, distilling the response to innumerable encounters with God. Prayer is like a Bluetooth connection, and while it lasts we become a channel through which flows the energy of the universe and Jewish history – the force of creations and the drive toward redemption. While it lasts, we make these energies our own."

In the essay Parental Authority and the Choice of a Marriage Partner, Rabbi Sacks concludes: "To be a Jewish parent is to make space for your child, as God makes space for us, His children."

In On Judaism and Islam, Rabbi Sacks writes, "Beneath the surface of the narrative in Chayei Sarah, the sages read the clues and pieced together a moving story of reconciliation between Abraham and Hagar on the one hand, Isaac and Ishmael on the other. Yes, there was conflict and separation; but that was the beginning, not the end. Between Judaism and Islam there can be friendship and mutual respect. Abraham loved both his sons and was laid to rest by both. There is hope for the future in this story of the past."

Rabbi Sacks shows us time and again that there is nothing stale, nothing out-of-date in the wisdom of Judaism. It began in ancient times, to be sure. It does not remain there.

Science funding cuts will harm Israel: Nobel laureate

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel's status as an internationally renowned leader in scientific research hangs in the balance due to cutbacks in government funding, warns Israeli Nobel Prize laureate Avram Hershko.

"Relative to our size, we can still be proud of our achievements in science," said Hershko – a Technion biochemist who shared the 2004 Nobel Prize in chemistry with Aaron Ciechanover, his former student, and Irwin Rose, an American – in an interview last week.

"But I'm worried about the future," he added.

Hershko, a 71-year-old Hungarian Holocaust survivor who immigrated to the Jewish state in 1950 with his parents, lamented that Israel does not give sufficient priority to higher education and research. As a result, he suggested, Israel's standing as a world power in a whole range of sciences has eroded.

"It won't be good if current trends continue," declared Hershko, who visited Toronto recently to attend the 50th anniversary celebrations of the Canada Gairdner Awards at the University of Toronto. "Israel will have to pay a high price. We won't have too many Nobel Prize winners in the future," he said.

Hershko, who arrived in Canada just weeks after Ada Yonath of the Weizmann Institute of Science shared the 2009 Nobel Prize in chemistry with two Americans, was the co-winner of the 1999 Gairdner Award, a coveted biomedical prize.

"It was my first major international award," he said.

Subsequently, he won six more prizes, including the Albert Lasker Award for Basic Medical Research and the Wolf Prize in medicine.

"There was a domino effect after the Gairdner."

In winning the Nobel Prize, the Nobel committee cited his work in the discovery of ubiquitin-mediated protein degradation. Ubiquitin proteasome pathways play a key role in maintaining the homeostasis of cells and are involved in the development and progression of diseases such as cancer and neurological and muscular diseases.

Avram Hershko

To Hershko, the ongoing cutbacks are supremely ironic, given the fact that Israel allotted infinitely more funds to basic scientific research many years ago, when it was a relatively poor country as compared to today.

Since the era of cutbacks started approximately a decade ago, Hershko has urged Israeli leaders from the prime minister on down to reconsider the policy.

"I've spoken about this many times, but we can't get through to the politicians. We can't make them understand the importance of higher education and research. They don't know what's important. They're not leaders, like [former Israeli prime minister] David Ben-Gurion."

The reductions have hit close to home.

Though his own funds have not been affected by the regime of fiscal restraint, the Technion budget has been cut by about 20 per cent, thus necessitating the elimination of academic positions.

"My research needs are met. The problem is that less famous faculty members have a hard time getting grants."

Donors abroad have mitigated the overall impact of cutbacks, he observed.

"Without the help of overseas supporters, it would be a real catastrophe. We still need the support of the Jewish people. We don't need more new buildings. We have to invest in young scientists."

Cutbacks have also caused a brain drain of major proportions, Hershko pointed out, saying that a significant number of promising students do not return from their studies abroad.

"Israel's future is in science and technology. We don't have natural resources. Our main exports are in high tech, which is based on education. We can't lose this edge. It's our main strength.

"It doesn't take a genius to understand that. I've explained this to government ministers. They say they understand, but nothing really happens."

Nevertheless, Israel is still a centre of scientific innovation in such diverse fields as physics, chemistry, medical science and the computer and electronic sciences.

Hershko, who was accompanied to Canada by his wife, Judith, a retired biologist, has no intention of retiring despite having reached the Technion's mandatory retirement age.

Despite his stature as a scientist, he must personally request annual extensions.

"I enjoy very much what I'm doing, in research and teaching. But there is more to do in my field, and as long as I can make progress, I will continue. I learn a lot by preparing new lectures, since they are based on new knowledge. I transmit knowledge, which is important."

H1N1 not major factor in school absenteesim

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Toronto's major Jewish day schools reported unchanged rates of absenteeism last week in the wake of the H1N1 pandemic.

A quick survey last week conducted by The CJN of Associated Hebrew Day Schools, United Synagogue Day School (USDS), Bialik Hebrew Day School, Leo Baeck Day School and the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (TanenbaumCHAT) found that flu rates did not increase week over week.

The only reported exception was at USDS, where "one group at our Bathurst [Beth Tzedec] campus had strep throat, but not the flu," according to head of school Claire Sumerlus. "Otherwise, there's been no significant change."

Shana Harris, head of school at Bialik, reported there was "no change" in flu rates at her school, while Arthur Landa, executive director at Associated, said there was "no particular spike" in absenteeism due to the flu last week.

Paul Shaviv, director of education at TanenbaumCHAT, reported that while his school also saw "no significant change" in absenteeism, there were still "a few individual cases of H1N1... reported among students and staff."

He said the high school continues to stress the importance of proper hand washing and the use of hand sanitizer, "and is tracking the situation day by day."

Absurd, but the danger rises

Last week, the United Nations General Assembly adopted the report commissioned by the UN Human Rights Council into Israel's Gaza war with Hamas authored by a panel led by Judge Richard Goldstone. By a vote of 114 countries in favour, 18 opposed and 44 abstentions, the General Assembly agreed to send the report to the UN secretary general for referral to the Security Council. After the vote, Secretary General Ban Ki-moon said he would send the report to the Security Council "as soon as possible."

While the report accuses both Israel and Hamas of committing war crimes and possible crimes against humanity, and calls on both sides to open independent investigations of the report's allegations, it has been widely condemned as yet another attack against the Jewish state from the human rights council, which no longer attempts to hide the veil that covers its obsessive mission of demonizing and delegitimizing the Jewish state. Some reports suggest that the report might be debated this week.

Israeli government and diplomatic officials have been assiduously working behind the scenes to ensure that the report travels no further than the Security Council. But even if one of the five permanent members of the Security Council vetoes any further action, in particular a possible reference to the International Court of Criminal Justice, Israel's enemies can still use the flawed and inflammatory report to subject Israel to further calumny and disgrace in the international arena.

To its great credit, Canada opposed the resolution to send the report to the Security Council. The government of Canada has consistently stood alongside a fellow democracy in its fight against terrorism, and it has consistently differentiated between the actions of an army trying to defend its people against terrorists and those of terrorists deliberately, boldly and quite unapologetically targeting civilians.

Unfortunately, Goldstone, paid only the merest lip service to the distinction that Canada and its fellow democracies are fighting so hard to establish and maintain.

On the weekend, he told a German newspaper that he was disappointed by what he called the "lukewarm" reaction to his findings in the United States. "The reactions in the international community were very mixed, but the lukewarm reaction from the United States disappointed me," Goldstone told das Parlament, a weekly newspaper published by the German Bundestag. Apparently, he was also surprised that "the reactions from Israel were so violent."

Nothing that emanates from Goldstone can shock us any more. His "disappointment" and "surprise" are of a piece with the entire cloth of breathtaking insensitivity and sightless vision in which he has wrapped himself.

That the report is still travelling along its course of targeted mischief is absurd, but still dangerous nonetheless.

Jewish heroes in Auschwitz

I am 86 years old, a Catholic and one of the two still-living eyewitnesses who as members of the Auschwitz prisoners fire brigade were sent to extinguish the fire of the crematorium buildings set by rebelling Jews in the wooded part of Auschwitz called Birkenau. This happened on Oct. 7, 1944.

Now on the 65th anniversary of this little-known event, it is my sacred duty to remember these Jewish heroes. They sacrificed their lives in the uneven battle with the SS guards. They killed three SS officers and burned to the ground crematorium and gas chamber No. 4 and destroyed and made unfit crematorium and gas chamber No. 2.

We, the 65,000 prisoners still in Auschwitz, were elated. It was unbelievable and fantastic news. These Jewish prisoners of Hungarian and Russian origins lifted our spirits. They had proven that the SS soldiers were not invincible and that a day of reckoning was coming.

Israeli policy gambles with Jewish lives

Ari Shavit writes that "the entire purpose" of Israel's exercises of force is "to stabilize the violent relationship between Israelis and Arabs" ("Watch out for the Goldstoners," Oct. 15). He continues, "Thus they create a temporary strong-arm balance that subdues the conflict and ensures calm for a few years." Undoubtedly, Shavit approves of these "demonstrations of power."

Herein lies the irrationality of Israeli policy. It strives for "balance" in a relationship that is "violent," rather than to remove the threat totally. This is nothing new. Such a policy stretches back to the founding of the state. In all of Israel's conflicts with the Arabs, the enemy has been able to declare victory as a result of this policy that obstructs the military from achieving its objectives. The Arabs are encouraged by perceived Israeli weakness and make ever greater efforts to destroy the Jewish state.

Such a policy is, on its own, irrational and irresponsible, as it gambles with Jewish lives – in the hope that our enemies will accept our existence and agree to live in peace with us. More unreasonable yet is that after all the lost lives and other terrible consequences of the Oslo accords and "land for peace," Israel's leaders are not deterred and remain committed to it.

Rabbis and imams in peace march?

That was an inspiring front-page picture of the ecumenical march for peace in Jerusalem (Oct. 15). My fantasy is that one day I will see rabbis and Islamic clergy marching arm in arm through those same streets. Their message can be simple: we are united in our belief that violence cannot solve problems; we advance only by communication, respect, and compromise.

Mixed messages in The CJN

We don't need mixed messages, at best they create confusion. On page 3, you covered UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's mid-campaign event that featured actor Marlee Matlin, who related that she married out of the faith and the marriage was officiated by both a rabbi and Catholic priest ("'Defying barriers': actor discusses her life at UJA event," Nov. 5). Furthermore, The CJN goes on (quoting her) to report how she has harmoniously integrated aspects of both religions. On another page, a large federation advertisement invites first-time campers to apply for a stipend, subject to one criterion: the potential camper cannot be attending a Jewish day school. Upon inquiring why the blatant discrimination, I was advised that this program endeavours to fight "intermarriage!" Something is very wrong!

Let us remember them

On Remembrance Day, we pay tribute to the memory of the men and women who have died in wars across the generations in the service of Canada and the forces of freedom and democracy. This year, we pay special homage to the memories of the 133 Canadian soldiers who have been killed in Afghanistan since 2002. The names appear in the order that they fell.

The following are our country's priorities in Afghanistan as articulated by the government of Canada.

"Canada is focused on a targeted set of objectives in keeping with proven Canadian strengths and consistent with Afghan objectives and the efforts of the international community.

The first four priorities focus primarily on Kandahar. Canada is helping the government of Afghanistan to:

- maintain a more secure environment and establish law and order by building the capacity of the Afghan National Army and Police, and support complementary efforts in the areas of justice and corrections;
- provide jobs, education and essential services, like water;
- provide humanitarian assistance to people in need, including refugees;
- enhance the management and security of the Afghanistan-Pakistan border.

Nationally, Canada is helping to:

- build Afghan institutions that are central to our Kandahar priorities, and support democratic processes such as elections;
- contribute to Afghan-led political reconciliation efforts aimed at weakening the insurgency and fostering a sustainable peace.

As Canada transforms its engagement in Afghanistan, our Kandahar-focused programming will comprise up to 50 per cent of our total effort, and more and more funding will be directed toward efforts to benefit the people of that province."

The power of now

Tomorrow is too late.

Every year before Neilah, I reread a passage from Rabbi Israel Meir Kagan's Mishneh Berurah. In it, he reminds us that Neilah is the last prayer of the High Holiday season, and we must change our ways, because "if not now, when." Neilah is a spiritual "bottom of the ninth," and we better be ready for our turn at bat. We need to grasp the power of now.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Unfortunately, we ignore the power of now the other 364 days of the year.

Procrastination is based on the illusion of immortality. For a procrastinator, the answer to "If not now, when?" is tomorrow, or the day after. But there might not be a tomorrow.

Too often, we let things fester, for no reason at all. In the 11th grade, I held a grudge against my roommate. We had had a falling out in September, and it grew to the point that we stopped speaking. Only in June, (after having spent the entire year in the shackles of a speechless resentment), did we make up, having virtually forgotten why we were fighting in the first place.

Grudges are a familiar experience for many. Too many people break off communication with those closest to them. Usually, in the back of their minds, they figure they'll make up eventually. But as time goes on, it gets harder to reconcile, and sometimes, it really is too late. Every rabbi has seen the tears of guilt at funerals, when mourners realize they have left too much unsaid. They figured they still had time. But tomorrow may be too late.

Indeed, the emphasis placed on "who will live and who will die" during the High Holidays is not pessimistic, but actually life-affirming. We need to recognize that now is the time, and we can't wait until tomorrow. Our inevitable deaths remind us not to procrastinate away precious opportunities.

We can't procrastinate, even with little things like calling your mother. There was once a South Central Bell commercial featuring the legendary football coach Bear Bryant. It was meant to be humorous, with the gruff coach looking at the camera and saying: "Have you called your mama today?" But Bryant, whose mother had passed away, ad-libbed and said: "Have you called your mama today? I sure wish I could call mine." This commercial became an instant hit.

Bryant and Rabbi Kagan are both teaching us the same lesson: the importance of the power of now. And on Yom Kippur, and every other day of the year, tomorrow may just be too late.

Jewish joy in the ghetto needs your help

The great financial meltdown of 2008 continues to wreak havoc, causing the great organizational shakedown of 2009. We should take advantage of these hard times to close institutions that only survive thanks to inertia or clever politicking. But we must ensure that worthy organizations aren't wiped out, too.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Since 2000, Montreal's student community has been blessed by an amazing institution called the Ghetto Shul. The jarring name – reflecting its location in the neighbourhood bordering McGill University known widely as the student "ghetto" – gives this generation of students a positive association with a word burdened by the scars of our tragic past. But making young students feel good about the word "ghetto" is only one of many ways the Ghetto Shul engages in tikkun olam, or fixing the world. At a crucial time in young Jews' lives, the Ghetto Shul offers a welcoming, hip, inspiring, warm, Jewish space to pray and play, learn and eat, and sing and dance.

Led by a dynamic husband-and-wife team, Rabbi Leibish and Dena Hundert, the Ghetto Shul helps make Friday night what it has been for centuries – the highlight of the week, the moment to delight in welcoming the Sabbath Queen, with utter joy. Every week, dozens of Montreal students – and 20-somethings – crowd into the shul. Some are observant and lucky they can do Jewish at an institution that has become central to McGill Jewish life. Some are traditional, and might have drifted away from Jewish life at other universities but have been attracted to the shul's friendly, intense, Kabbalat Shabbat – and it's all-important Shabbat dinner scene. And some are uncommitted, having grown up without Shabbat dinner and all of a sudden going occasionally, or even regularly, because, believe it or not, it's fun.

All, as Jews in the modern world, are searching for something. All are blessed and cursed by the dizzying array of choices that today's world offers, able to be whatever they wish but overwhelmed by so many options and so few anchors. Many, unfortunately, arrive at the Ghetto Shul already Jewishly scarred, having been bored by Hebrew school, narcotized by their staid synagogue back home, or misled by their parents' sorry example into thinking that Judaism is a thin gruel of ethnic food, juvenile holiday rituals, colourful expressions and simplistic lessons, with one day of fasting a year and a big blowout guaranteed when you turn 13.

The Ghetto Shul is constructively counter-cultural. It's a place of warm hugs, not awkward handshakes. It's a place of ecstatic prayer, not polite posturing. It's a place of substantive spirituality, not superficial guilt-mongering. It's a place where students feel welcome and at home, but they also feel Jewishly stretched and fulfilled.

Unfortunately, the Ghetto Shul is also a place at risk of closing. If more individuals and more institutions don't support this amazing institution, it won't survive, certainly not in the long term. This isn't a matter of figuring out how to raise money for a year or two. The question here is how does the broader Jewish community ensure that this positive Jewish space grows, that it inspires legions of imitators, and that it helps guarantee Jewish survival in the 21st century.

In the real world, one of the first steps in that process is securing regular funding. A place such as the Ghetto Shul should be flooded with honorary memberships. Alumni, parents, Montrealers, Jews from the rest of Canada and others should step up to pay the $360 annual fee to join the Ghetto Shul. And they should commit to doing so for the next 10 years. This way, Rabbi Leibish, Dina and their devoted student leaders can focus on nurturing their community rather than raising money to stay afloat.

If a small number of people, say 300 or 400, undertook to make this relatively small investment, the payoff would be enormous. These people and others would be contributing to a successful Jewish community that serves hundreds of students and Montreal-area 20-somethings every year, while pioneering institutions rooted in our past, fulfilling us in the present and guaranteeing us a meaningful future.

Gathering sparks in a dark, shattered world

Rabbi Shimon ben Shetach was working hard, so his disciples bought a donkey from a heathen to help him, and a pearl was found hidden in the saddle. "Does its owner know of the pearl?" he asked. "No." "Then give the pearl back to him." "But you need not return the pearl, because he is a heathen!" The rabbi responded, "Do you think that I am a barbarian? I would prefer to hear the heathen say, 'Blessed be the God of the Jews,' than to possess all the riches of the world!"

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein in Jerusalem

Me, too. I'd rather hear "Blessed be the God of the Jews" than have all the Bernie Madoffs in the world.

I'd rather do enough good in the world under a Jewish banner than be insulated in my own Jewish middle-class world where everything is OK. Tikkun olam – repairing the world – is what I can do with my life, not just my money, to bring about the day the world will say "Blessed be the God of the Jews."

Tikkun olam refers to social action programs, to tzedakah (charitable giving) and gemilut chasadim (acts of kindness). But it's originally associated with Kabbalah and has much deeper theological meaning. The kabbalists ask, "How can the world contain God, who is the world?" The answer: when God created the world, 10 vessels contained the overpowering amount of "Godliness" that was present. It was too much. The vessels broke, and "sparks" of Godliness were released into the darkness.

Thus in our broken, dark, shattered world, sparks of Godliness can still be found. The gathering of those sparks is, according to Kabbalah, called tikkun olam, repairing the broken vessels of creation. That spark is not only in Jews, but in all of humanity. We can repair the broken vessels of creation. It's not just a nice thing to do – a feel-good moment in a soup kitchen. We can remake the world. We can advance history. Tikkun olam causes a fundamental shift in the universe.

Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, in his book To Heal The World, teaches that Judaism is a religion of sacred discontent. Abraham, Moses, Amos, Isaiah are messengers of sacred discontent, of dissatisfaction with the status quo. Confronting priests and kings, arguing with God, challenging the accepted norms of piety: these are our legacies. He writes, "In Judaism, faith is not acceptance, but protest, against the world that is, in the name of the world that is not yet but ought to be… Judaism is not peace of mind. I remain in awe at the challenge God has set us: to build, to change, to 'mend' the world until it becomes a place worthy of the divine presence, because we have learned to honour the image of God that is humankind." God's light is waiting to be discovered and redeemed among the broken vessels of all humanity this year.

Dear readers: An article in the Oct. 1 edition of The CJN described my friend and colleague Adrienne Rosen's quest to find her daughter's birth mother in Guatemala. In fact, as a result of that trip, Adrienne started a non-profit organization to ensure that all the children of the little town of La Union can go to school and thus escape the cycle of poverty that might have destroyed her daughter. The more children in La Union go to school, the more chance there is of changing one small corner of the world. I am proud to be on the board of this new organization, Access Education Guatemalan Children's Fund. This is the kind of tikkun olam I'm talking about: a Jew who cares enough about "the other" to make a difference. People can find out more about this organization by going to www.accesseducation.ca.

Israel's treaty with Jordan holds up after 15 years

"This is a peace with dignity. This is a peace with commitment... It will not be simply a piece of paper..."

King Hussein of Jordan uttered these heartfelt words when Israel and Jordan signed a historic peace treaty in the Arava Desert on Oct. 26, 1994. The ceremony, brimming with pomp and circumstance, was attended by a procession of dignitaries, notably the president of the United States, Bill Clinton, and the prime ministers of Israel and Jordan, Yitzhak Rabin and Abdelsalam al-Majali.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Fifteen years on, Israel's second peace treaty with an Arab state has endured, despite sharp policy disagreements, a major crisis and vocal calls from within Jordan for its abrogation. Although it is a strategic asset to both countries, the treaty essentially remains a government-to-government document, a king's peace, and is generally unpopular in Jordan on a grassroots level. Much like Israel's 1979 peace treaty with Egypt, it is fundamentally bereft of warmth and basically supported and nurtured by the regime – headed by King Abdullah II since King Hussein's untimely death in 1999 – out of necessity.

King Abdullah, King Hussein's designated successor, has welcomed Israeli leaders and delegations to Amman, including Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. But as king, he has visited Israel only once. By contrast, his father went to Israel several times in highly publicized trips to promote the treaty. On one such trip, he paid his respects to seven bereaved families whose schoolgirl daughters had been killed by a Jordanian soldier.

In accordance with the speech he delivered on the day the treaty was officially activated, King Hussein was committed to establishing a sound and stable relationship with Israel. Long before 1994, King Hussein maintained contact with Israel through secret channels, though, under intense pan-Arab pressure and his better judgment, he went to war against Israel in 1967, losing the West Bank in the process.

In the wake of the Six Day War, the PLO created a state within a state in Jordan and launched bombardments of and raids into Israel from Jordanian territory, exposing the Hashemite kingdom to Israeli retaliatory operations. In a showdown, King Hussein drove the PLO out of Jordan, stabilizing the border with Israel. Amidst a Jordanian civil war, Israel propped up Jordan by squelching a Syrian invasion.

On the eve of the Yom Kippur War, King Hussein personally warned Israel's prime minister, Golda Meir, that Egypt and Syria planned an attack to recapture the Sinai Peninsula and the Golan Heights. But caving in to the siren song of Arab solidarity, he dispatched a symbolic armoured force to the Golan to fight alongside Syria.

During the postwar period, King Hussein tried in vain to settle territorial disputes with Israel through the good offices of the United States and through a Saudi Arabian peace proposal. In 1987, he and Shimon Peres, Israel's foreign minister of the day, signed an accord calling for a Middle East peace conference. It was scuttled by Yitzhak Shamir, the Israeli prime minister. Shortly afterward, King Hussein abandoned his claim to the West Bank.

With Israel and the PLO having forged a rapprochement in 1993 under the Oslo peace accords, King Hussein was finally ready to come to terms with Israel, though many of his Palestinian subjects, comprising two-thirds of Jordan's population, bitterly opposed the idea. The king's motives were clear. He wanted to bury the possibility of a future war with Israel and consign the "Jordan is Palestine" formula, backed by some segments of Israel's elite, to the dustbin.

On July 25, 1994, Jordan and Israel signed the Washington Declaration, a non-belligerency pact. Three months later, at a border crossing near Eilat, a formal peace treaty, consisting of a preamble, 30 articles and five annexes, normalized their relations and resolved their territorial disputes. The treaty was fleshed out by 15 bilateral agreements.

It was a win-win situation for both sides.

Israel opened an embassy in Amman, gaining Jordan's formal recognition – a fact of no small importance considering that Israel shared its longest border with the Jordanians – and its co-operation in the battle against terrorism.

As stipulated in the treaty, Israel ceded about 300 square kilometres of land, mostly in the Arava, promised to deliver 50 million cubic metres of potable water per annum, and accepted Jordan's role as guardian of Islamic and Christian holy places in eastern Jerusalem.

In the meantime, the United States forgave Jordan's $700-million debt and played a pivotal role in the establishment of Qualified Industrial Zones in Jordan, where goods are manufactured with Israeli components and exported to the United States free of tariffs and quotas. QIZs, as they are known in Jordan, have generated 20,000 jobs, sent exports soaring by about $1 billion per year and validated the treaty in the eyes of some Jordanians.

It is generally agreed that Rabin's assassination, in November 1995, dented the treaty, since King Hussein had formed a close personal bond with the Israeli leader and considered him a true partner. At Rabin's funeral, he described him as a "brother" and "friend."

The king's relationship with Rabin's successors, Peres and Netanyahu, were problematic. He accused Peres of using disproportionate force and killing civilians in Operation Grapes of Wrath, a 16-day military blitz in Lebanon in 1996 designed to weaken Hezbollah. And he thought he should have been consulted before Netanyahu ordered the opening of an archeological tunnel near the Temple Mount, an event that caused widespread rioting and bloodshed. The king was also angered by Netanyhu's announcement, in 1997, that he intended to build a new housing estate in Har Homa, in eastern Jerusalem.

For King Hussein, however, the last straw was the 1997 Khaled Meshal affair, in which Mossad agents carrying Canadian passports tried to murder a prominent Hamas leader in Amman. This incident, which resulted in the release of Hamas founder Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, almost drove Jordan to sever diplomatic relations and security co-operation with Israel.

Even if these incidents had not occurred, King Hussein would have been hard-pressed to whip up popular support for the treaty. An anti-normalization campaign, spearheaded by Islamists, leftists and professionals, has vehemently opposed political, economic and cultural ties with Israel. Having taken these developments into account, King Abdullah II has been quite cautious in his approach to Israel and critical of its policies. Several joint projects, including a common airport for Eilat and Aqaba, have not been implemented, and the volume of trade remains low.

Jordan has taken a leading role in lambasting the construction of Israel's separation barrier on the grounds that it undermines the chances for building a viable Palestinian state and threatens Jordan's national security by implicitly reviving the "Jordan is Palestine" option. Six months ago, Jordan issued a strong protest after a right-wing Israeli parliamentarian inalterably opposed to territorial compromise suggested that Jordan should serve as a Palestinian state. More recently, Jordan reprimanded Israel when its de facto representative in eastern Jerusalem was denied permission to enter the Temple Mount compound.

A strong supporter of the Arab League peace initiative, Jordan has urged Israel to embrace the proposal and agree to a settlement freeze in the West Bank. Responding to Israel's invasion of Gaza last winter, Jordan recalled its ambassador, but sent him back to Tel Aviv once Operation Cast Lead ended.

Jordan, a victim of Al Qaeda terrorism, is not likely to cancel its peace treaty with Israel. In 2007, in an implicit reference to Islamic radicalism, King Abdullah II told an Israeli delegation, "We are in the same boat. We have the same enemies." It's doubtful whether he has since changed his mind.

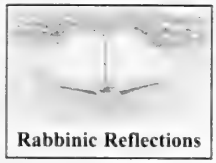
To walk in God's ways: visiting the sick

By RABBI RENA ARSHINOFF



People sometimes share with me their apprehension about paying a visit to a sick relative or friend. Visiting the sick is an obligation to which we are all bound, yet sometimes we feel uncomfortable when faced with it.

Although they were written centuries ago to reflect relevant concerns, many of our law code guidelines around visiting the sick (bikur cholim) still apply. As Jews, we strive to treat others as we want to be treated, not only within our own Jewish community, but with everyone, making this mitzvah applicable to all. Our studies teach us that we are to visit non-Jews as well as Jews, and even people whom we dislike, because that is the way of peaceful living with all humans.

Bikur cholim is done within certain parameters. We may not visit at a time that is convenient for us alone, or presume a visit is desired. Sick people must be respected and not embarrassed, and so we must find other ways to fulfil bikur cholim, such as asking about them at their home, work location or social setting, making a phone call, sending food, helping with children, carpools or other household concerns. The law codes guide us to this day on ways to help the sick stay connected to their community.

Praying for the sick is an important component of the mitzvah, although this may not occur as frequently today during the visit. Public prayer for the sick in the Misheberach liturgy holds a significant place in our synagogue services, recited for people who are ill and offering hope for both the ill person and for the caregiver.

It provides the suffering person some reassurance that he/she is not alone, as it is a request for God to strengthen, restore health and revive the individual, resulting in complete and swift healing. The recitation of names of sick individuals also makes the situation more real and can allow others to reach out to the individual or caregiver, offering healing that way as well.

The stigma of illness and its associated emotions can contribute to a person's sense of isolation. Being cut off by hospitalization or the effect of rejection and social denial for illnesses such as AIDS, mental illness and addictions is frightening for most people. The law codifiers were aware of the need to keep the sick connected with their community. Recovering from illness, healing emotionally and spiritually, and then re-integrating back into the community after an illness are challenging tasks

The stigma of illness may lead to loneliness, loss of confidence and self-esteem, or loss of belonging. We must help people avoid such social isolation. In our modern times, we have great technology and services that can provide physical care, but we are obligated nonetheless to remember Leviticus 19:18: "Love your fellow as yourself," and Exodus 18:20: "Enjoin upon them the laws and the teachings, and make known to them the way they are to go and the practices they are to follow."

These verses are the basis for many talmudic writings and Halachah concerning bikur cholim. When we visit the sick, we do so in a Jewish way steeped in tradition, history and biblical law.

Berakhot 5b tells us that a prisoner cannot release himself from prison; so, too, must the community provide assistance to those who are ill, who need our assistance, physically, emotionally or spiritually. Do not be afraid to visit the sick – we have guidelines that help us assist the ill in our communities. Trust yourself – you will feel profoundly fulfilled by this beautiful mitzvah.

The first Jewish interpreter

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Within the upcoming Torah portions, we are granted a glimpse into a very intimate moment between Rebecca and God. After many years of infertility, Rebecca conceives and becomes pregnant with twins. She doesn't know that she's carrying two babies and consequently worries greatly as to what she feels in her womb. We're led to believe that these twins aren't quiet, cuddle-together kind of babies, but that within Rebecca's womb there's a jostling and near-battle taking place over positioning in readiness for birth.

As a result of the turmoil, the Torah tells us that Rebecca seeks out God. In fact, the phrase the Torah uses to describe Rebecca's action is vatelech lidrosh, "she went to seek." Two very interesting Hebrew words are utilized in this phrase. The first, vatelech, feeds off the phrase lech lecha, the first words God spoke to Abraham, which begin the covenantal journey. God has approached Abraham with a shared vision, but also a command to never be stagnant, "to go" (lech). Judaism is immediately envisioned as a journey of the soul, in which the process and questioning and discoveries along the way are themselves the focus.

Rebecca has journeyed to be united with Isaac, but her spiritual journey is described to us in this portion where the Torah clearly states vatelech, and she journeyed. The Hebrew phrase continues by telling us where her journey led her and that she ultimately approached God. The word lidrosh is most often translated as "to seek," but it's also the word used to describe searching and demanding. When the Talmud speaks of interrogating witnesses, it states that they're subject to drisha, a demand for the truth. The Torah has now told us that Rebecca is journeying to seek God, and her inquiry contains within it a demand for truth.

At the same time, the word lidrosh is used by the rabbis repeatedly to discuss investigating text in order to interpret its meaning. It implies that the surface, or plain meaning of the text, covers many layers of deeper truths and understandings. Now the Torah has told us that Rebecca is seeking God, demanding truth, but that this process must be interactive, since she will have to interpret God's answer.

And, in fact, the Torah narrative plays out in exactly that way. God reveals to Rebecca that she is not carrying ordinary twins, but that there are two nations within her. She is told they are destined to part ways and the older will serve the younger. It seems that this information is quite clear, but what Rebecca must interpret is whether God has described what will happen, or has God in fact prescribed to Rebecca what should happen.

If it's a description, Rebecca should do nothing but watch it unfold. However, if it's a prescription, Rebecca must take action to see that God's intent is carried out. She waits a lifetime, watching, and only when she believes that Isaac is dying does she become active, with a last-minute desperate attempt to make God's words come true. In her desperation, Rebecca enacts a plan of deception that will tear the family apart.

Rebecca is Judaism's second matriarch and the ancestor that introduces the concept of interpretation into covenant. She has correctly devoted her entire life to try to understand the words God spoke. The flaw is that no one in her family was speaking openly to each other. She didn't know that the twins had already enacted God's words years before. Her study of God's words was not enough. She needed to actively share her vision.

It's traditional for Jews to study Torah with a partner or a group. In that way, the study becomes action, since it enriches knowledge and builds community and relationships. We learned this hard lesson from Rebecca. As the rabbis in the Mishnah stated: "Not study, but action, is the essence of the matter."

Ancient synagogues

With the Jewish holidays having finished not that long ago, a look at the archeology of ancient synagogues is a timely topic. It is a topic archeologists have concerned themselves with for well over a century.

Past Forward

The origin of the synagogue is still widely debated, although many scholars look to the Babylonian exile for its beginnings. It was during this time that our people needed a sense of identity, a place to gather, as well as an anchor for their ancestral faith, which had been so badly shaken by Nebuchadnezzar's destruction and forced deportation. It was the synagogue that would provide all of these elements for the exiles.

The term synagogue is Greek in its linguistic origin and is the equivalent of the Hebrew beit knesset, or meeting house, which is probably how the institution began. It gave the Jews of the exile a place to meet and pray.

Despite the central role of the Temple in Jewish worship prior to its destruction in 586 BCE, other cultic sites have been found throughout Israel dating from before the event. Afterward, there is even more evidence of buildings of worship in places such as Egypt. In fact, Greek inscriptions dating to the third century BCE mention synagogues have been found in the Fayum oasis in Egypt.

The remains of synagogues have also been found throughout the ancient Mediterranean world. Among the oldest synagogue to be excavated is the one on the island of Delos in the Aegean Sea. Delos is said to have been the birthplace of Apollo and was the treasury of the Greek alliance, known as the Delian Confederacy. The confederacy was headed by Athens in fifth century BCE.

In Athens, a menorah made of marble was found in the excavations of the agora, or ancient marketplace. It indicates the presence of a synagogue, but more conclusive evidence is needed to clinch the identification.

One of the earliest synagogues in the ancient Mediterranean has been found at Ostia Antica, the harbour city for Rome. Ostia is one of the best-preserved Roman cities to have survived from antiquity, almost as well preserved as the better-known site of Pompeii. As it was a city devoted to trade, it is not unusual to find a colony of Jews in its midst.

It should also be kept in mind that in the early centuries of the Common Era, Jews made up as much as 10 per cent of the population of the Roman Empire. Initially, the line was blurred between Judaism and Christianity, with an intermingling occurring when it came to worship. This should come as no surprise, since only two Jewish sects survived the destruction of the Second Temple. One would go on to become normative Judaism, while the other, Jewish Christianity, would divorce itself from its Jewish roots.

The largest Diaspora synagogue so far unearthed from ancient times is the one found in Sardis, an important city in Asia Minor, or Turkey as it is now called. The synagogue dates from the fourth century, which is somewhat unusual since this was the time Christianity became the official religion of the Roman Empire and it began to view Jews and their religion with hostility.

However, the vast majority of synagogues that have been discovered and excavated were found in Israel, especially since the establishment of the State in 1948, and even more so since 1967. Many of these synagogues have been found in the Galilee and the Golan. They are showing us that Jewish religious and communal life remained vigorous in Israel even after the disaster of the two revolts against Rome.

What the discovery of these ancient synagogues demonstrates is that despite major calamities, we have managed to survive and maintain our religious identity in a vigorous way. The synagogue has been an integral part of that survival.

The digital genizah

A genizah is a storeroom or depository, usually in a synagogue, where worn-out Hebrew books or papers are placed. Holy works are hidden away for centuries or forever, often never to be seen again. When discovered, as happened in Cairo in the 19th century, a genizah can be a priceless resource where Jewish scholarship and tradition are revealed.

The Jewish Highway

The web is emerging as a type of digital genizah. Hundreds of Jewish books, many of which had vanished for centuries, are now being made available to new generations of admirers. Most of these volumes are in the public domain, not copyrighted or the sites have received special permission to distribute them.

SeforimOnline is one of those sites. It has scanned the contents of more than 2,500 Jewish books, including a 1583 edition of Masaos R' Binyomin MiTudela, the journeys of medieval explorer Benjamin of Tudela. The website's interface is professionally executed with a brief English summary of contents for every volume. Click on a link and a pdf copy of the book downloads onto your hard drive. [bit.ly/jlib12]

Hebrewbooks.org has set for itself a formidable goal: to include on its site all Torah seforim ever printed. As the site explains, "If you were to ask any rabbi who authored a sefer, what his one wish would be, his answer would surely be, 'I want people to learn my sefer, even after my passing'... Our rabbis of blessed memory teach us that 'he who quotes a saying in the name of its author hastens the redemption of the world.'" The site already has more than 40,000 books for free download. As well, there's a brief video about the scanning process and a Twitter feed that announces newly scanned books. [bit.ly/jlib13]

For more remarkable finds, over at the Digitized Manuscripts Collection at the National Library of Israel, you can view the 10th-century "Crown of Damascus" Torah, a worldwide collection of ketubot and a treasury of talmudic manuscripts [bit.ly/jlib14] along with the impressive Digitized Book Repository. [bit.ly/jlib15]

The National Library of Canada houses the Jacob M. Lowy Collection of old and rare Hebraica and Judaica. [bit.ly/jlib04] View Halacha Brura and Berur Halacha Institute publications (Hebrew only) at bit.ly/jlib16, and the Penn/Cambridge genizah fragment project contains fragments of various documents from the Cairo genizah. [bit.ly/jlib17]

If you still want to get the feel of a real book in your hands and you have a few bucks to spare (about $40 million or so), you can follow in the footsteps of Jack Lunzer, whose love of Jewish books predates the Internet era. A lifelong bibliophile, Lunzer has amassed 13,000 Jewish books and manuscripts from far-flung centres, including Paris, Izmir, Bombay, Cochin, Cremona, Jerusalem, Ferrara, Calcutta, Shanghai, Alexandria and Baghdad. His collection includes the following.

- A handwritten Torah, the only known surviving Hebrew text from England dated prior to the expulsion of the Jews in 1290
- The earliest illustrated Haggadah known to exist, printed in Prague in 1526
- The first book ever printed in Africa, a Hebrew book about prayer from Fez in 1516

Lunzer has put the library up for sale with the proviso that the collection be sold as a whole and not be broken up. The New York Times has created a lovely profile and slide show of this magnificent library and of Lunzer, who will not be benefiting from the sale. [bit.ly/jlib19] Don't miss the stunning brochure creating by Sotheby's about "the finest private library of Hebrew books and manuscripts in the world." [bit.ly/jlib21]

As the Times pointed out, excerpts of the words of the 12th-century Spanish Jewish scholar Judah Ibn Tibbon are found on a wall adjacent to the collection. "Make books your companions; let your bookshelves be your gardens; bask in their beauty, gather their fruit, pluck their roses, take their spices and myrrh. And when your soul be weary, change from garden to garden, and from prospect to prospect." [bit.ly/jlib20]

Scientist uses research to detect explosives

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Thanks to Ron Naaman, your next flight to Israel will be a little more secure.

That's because Naaman, a professor in the department of chemical physics at the Weizmann Institute of Science, has developed ways to help airport security in the Jewish state detect liquids that can be used as explosives.

He says his work centres on the "intersection of biology and electronics."

"All living things are composed of chains or structures of molecules, and what we see in their interactions, we use to build electronic devices, specifically nano-sensors," he told last week's Weizmann Canada national annual meeting.

Naaman, who did post-doctoral research at Stanford and Harvard universities before joining Weizmann, has applied his work to such things as diagnosing asthma by measuring the content of exhaled breath and to detecting contaminated contents in pharmaceutical capsules and sealed food.

But the Israeli government has used it to detect homemade explosives in airports.

"[People can easily] buy two solutions in a pharmacy that [when put together] become a powerful explosive that cannot be detected by animals," Naaman said. "That is why we cannot take liquids on a plane."

Since 9/11, it's become a major issue to determine how to detect these explosives, he said, and Naaman and his colleagues have developed a way to differentiate between dangerous and safe compounds. "It is important to have sensitivity and selection, because we do not want to close up the airports for nothing."

In his welcoming remarks, Jay Alan Smith, chairman of the board of Weizmann Canada, said that to mark the 45th year of the Canadian society and the 60th year of the Weizmann Institute, Weizmann Canada has rebranded and updated its image in a project supported by the Silver Tree Foundation.

Toronto Workmen's Circle celebrates 100 years

'From the earliest times, it was a potent force in the community'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Current and past members of Toronto Workmen's Circle, as well as its former campers and students, will converge Nov. 14 and 15 to celebrate the organization's 100th anniversary.

Being held at the Workmen's Circle building at 471 Lawrence Ave. W., the celebration includes a Yiddish Radio Show, a brunch and presentation about the Workmen's Circle's past and present, an alumni reunion, and a concert and sing-along with Yiddish singer Adrienne Cooper and pianist Marilyn Lerner.

Marvin Schiff, chair of the city committee, the governing body of the local Workmen's Circle, said that the centenary celebrations are important "because Workmen's Circle is one of the venerable organizations. From the earliest times, it was a potent force in the community."

The organization was founded in New York City in 1903, he said, by immigrants who wanted health benefits and a setting in which to promote their culture and language.

It was founded on three principles, including rendering aid in moments of stress or emergency, preserving and strengthening cultural Jewishness among its members and the Jewish community, and serving the community by working for social justice.

Its declaration of principles states that it's devoted "to the liberation of all people; participates in democratic, progressive, cultural and social endeavours; and is joined with the labour movement in striving for a higher standard of living and genuine economic security, and in lighting the pathway to further progress and a fuller democracy."

The peak times for the local organization, were in the 1920s and then again in the 1960s, he said. "At the apex, there were 1,000 members all over Ontario."

Now, he said there are about 250 members, including a 23-year-old who joined after learning about the organization's activities while at university.

Since its inception, Toronto Workmen's Circle established a Jewish supplementary school that taught Yiddish and Yiddishkeit, as well as a residential camp in Pickering, Ont., Camp Yungvelt – no longer in operation– that was known in its early days for accepting poor immigrants' children for little money.

Mel Cederbaum, director of Toronto Workmen's Circle, said the centenary is supported by the Committee for Yiddish of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto under its program Yiddish Canada in the 20th century.

"I'm hoping to draw people back who have memories of going to camp or school. They might want to become active again."

Helen Schreibman-Smith, a former Camp Yungvelt camper who is travelling from London, England, to take part in the celebration said that "my best memories of my childhood and teen years were summers spent at camp. It was a place where it was like having a big family, many of the same campers and staff turning up year after year."

Cederbaum said Workmen's Circle is looking to develop a younger generation of leaders "to guide [us] into the 21st century. It is important to have an organization that celebrates the secular approach to Judaism."

For information on the centenary celebration call 416-787-2081 or e-mail wcarto@yahoo.com.

Kielburger brothers receive Plaut award

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Thornhill brothers Craig and Marc Kielburger, founders of Free the Children, an international non-profit organization that has built more than 500 schools in developing countries, called on Jewish youth to get involved and change the world.

The Kielburgers were at Holy Blossom Temple last week to accept the W. Gunther Plaut Humanitarian Award for their contribution to improving conditions for the less fortunate.

The award, which is given every two years, was named after its first recipient, Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut, the congregation's spiritual leader in the 1960s and '70s.

Rabbi John Moscowitz, Holy Blossom's current spiritual leader, said the award – which has been presented to such people as Liberal Senator Romeo Dallaire and MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler – reflects the spirit of Rabbi Plaut, 97, who was known to stand up for the vulnerable.

The Kielburgers, who released a book in September titled The World Needs Your Kid – which includes anecdotes from their years of volunteerism and insights from such contributors as actors Sarah Polley, Jane Fonda, and Mia Farrow – are the seventh recipients of the prize.

Hundreds of parents and their children gathered at Holy Blossom to hear the Kielburgers speak and to browse the lower level of the shul, where a "marketplace" was set up to provide information about organizations such as the Holy Blossom Social Action Committee, Free the Children, and STAND Canada, a youth-led anti-genocide advocacy group.

Journalist and senator Linda Frum, a member of the shul and its Plaut Award committee, said the Kielburgers are among a growing number of Canadians who are working to provide better education and health care to those in need.

"Tonight we honour two special brothers who although they are not Jewish themselves... they do not see a distinction between helping their own kind and helping all of God's children," she said.

After showing a video with highlights from last month's We Day, an annual event conceived by the two brothers that aims to empower youth to make positive change in the world, Craig, 26, and Marc, 32, both took to the stage to speak about their goal of continuing to encourage young people to become involved in social justice initiatives.

"For us, this award carries a special honour... because this is a community that has such a rich history of social justice, such an extraordinary legacy of service," Craig said of Holy Blossom.

Marc added that what they hear from youth is that they want to be engaged, and through Free the Children, they're given the opportunity to get involved at the local and international levels.

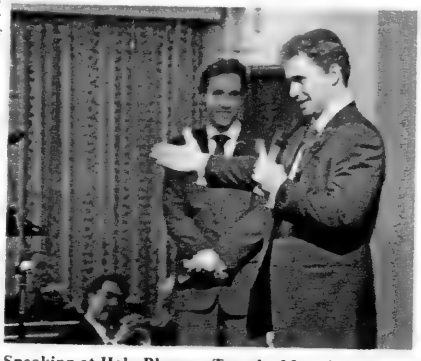
Craig said the first step is inspiring young people.

"Once we get them inspired, we challenge them. We give them the tools and the systems in their schools to get involved, but they are the true heroes because they take the next steps."

Marc spoke about some of the campaigns that run through Free the Children, including the Halloween for Hunger campaign, during which youth from all over North America collect non-perishable food items while they trick or treat and donate the food to a local food bank.

For the Vow of Silence campaign, students disconnect themselves from social networking sites such as Facebook and Twitter to raise awareness and funds for children silenced by poverty, war and oppression.

"We know that young people do care. We know that young people are getting engaged and getting involved, they are a part of this conversation. We know that changing the world can be cool," Marc said.



Speaking at Holy Blossom Temple, Marc Kielburger urged Jewish youth to become involved in social justice projects, while his brother Craig looks on.

He added that countless Canadian young people have reached out to more than 45 countries, helping to provide clean water or medical supplies, and helping with education projects.

"They understand that it's possible... to build a new school, provide better education, clean water, better health care and alternative sources of income, because if we're going to create change we need to do it from a systemic point of view," Marc said, adding that the ultimate goal is to build self-sustaining villages.

Craig offered some statistics on the amount of money governments spend on foreign aid compared to what people spend annually on superficial items such as makeup and ice cream.

"When you look at the numbers, they're staggering. We spent $18 billion last year on makeup and cosmetics. That's more than it would take to feed every person in this world," he said.

Cantorial soloist launches new CD

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Ten years ago, Lindi Rivers was a psychotherapist who loved her work and found it fulfilling.

Now a cantorial soloist at Holy Blossom Temple, the lyric soprano is releasing her first CD, an 11-track collection of Hebrew and English liturgical music called Lazman Hazeh. A launch will be held Nov. 18 at the synagogue.

Last year's "Kol Isha" concert at the Leah Posluns Theatre, in which Rivers took part, was the impetus for the CD, which took about a year to prepare.

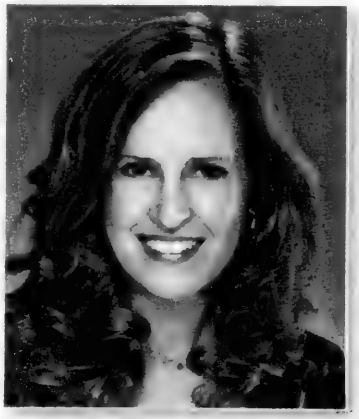
"I thought, 'This is the time,'" she said in an interview.

Her comment echoed the CD's Hebrew title, the last two words of the Shehechiyanu prayer, which expresses gratitude to God at times of celebration and firsts.

Having turned 50 on June 1, Rivers says now that the CD became, in a sense, "a great milestone gift to myself."

"I chose songs that had touched me in some way," she added.

Shalom Rav, for example, is a sentimental favourite. "I really wanted to include that for my mother and my husband in particular – they're both very attached to that piece – and to honour Ben Steinberg, because he's been such a strong leader and contributor of Jewish music, and composer."



Lindi Rivers

As well, she said, Steinberg – composer-in-residence at Temple Sinai, where Rivers started her cantorial soloist career – was very supportive and helpful to her.

Rivers, a mother of two, began what would become her second career as a Temple Sinai choir member and soloist.

About 10 years ago, she recalls, the late Rabbi Jordan Pearlson – the founding rabbi of the congregation who died in 2008 – went up to her after a Yom Kippur service, put his hands on her face, and said with great deliberation, 'You must begin to study to become a chazzan.' "

Another turning point – in fact, the experience that led to her decision to change course – was when she was asked in 2000 to substitute for Temple Sinai's cantor at a Friday night service.

"I spent the next two weeks preparing," Rivers remembers. She had never led services before, and found the preparation to be "a life-altering experience... Whenever I sang these prayers, and Shalom Rav was one of them, I would just be in tears. Suddenly it was taking on new meaning. I was going to be leading the congregation in prayer, not just involved in my own personal prayer."

"Of course I was scared to death," she laughed. "[But] it was fine."

The following year, she joined the Lachan Jewish Chamber Choir, directed by Holy Blossom's Cantor Benjamin Maissner.

Along the way, she also led High Holy Day services at Beth Israel Synagogue in Peterborough, and in 2001, she became cantorial soloist at Temple Anshe Sholom in Hamilton, where her aunt, Ruth Slater, is cantor emeritus.

Rivers was born in Toronto and raised in St. Catharines, Ont., where she attended Hebrew school at Congregation B'nai Israel. She had her bat mitzvah at St. Catharines' Reform congregation, Temple Tikvah, which her parents and others co-founded, and was active in its youth group, where she played guitar and sang Jewish music.

After graduating from the University of Western Ontario with an honours BA in psychology, she moved to Toronto, where she obtained her master of social work degree from the University of Toronto.

Rivers grew up with music, starting piano lessons at age five, and singing lessons a year later. She first took part in community theatre at age six as one of the children in The King and I.

"I was totally hooked," she said.

Her new CD was produced by Stuart Zaltz, who Rivers had worked with in Hamilton.

"I think the music and the arrangements are so accessible and easy to listen to," Rivers said.

The CD is available at Holy Blossom Temple and other temple gift shops, several Toronto Judaica stores and through Rivers' website, lindirivers.com.

Iran's proxy war on Israel makes headlines

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

On Nov. 4, the Israeli Navy intercepted the "Francop" cargo ship, which was laden with a massive amount of Iranian-supplied weapons, hidden among civilian cargo and bound for Hezbollah. The story received mixed attention in the Canadian media.

The Nov. 5 National Post gave the story front-page prominence, with the headline "Israelis Seize 500 Tonnes of Iranian-Supplied Weapons" and a photo showing crates loaded with rockets and mortar shells. The accompanying story, on an inside page, gave details about the "unprecedented" size and nature of the seized weapons, and the fact that the shipment was headed for Syria, which typically forwards Iranian rockets to Hezbollah in Lebanon – all in defiance of UN Security Council resolutions.

The Toronto Star carried a substantial Associated Press story headlined "Israelis seize huge arms shipment." It highlighted a statement from Israeli military spokesperson Avital Leibovich: "All the cargo certificates are stamped at the ports of origin, and this one was stamped at an Iranian port," which emphasized the Iranian connection.

However, the Globe and Mail, like the New York Times, just ran a brief news digest item.

This was not the only story involving Iranian-supplied weapons making news last week.

Israeli Minister of Defence Ehud Barak inspects the missiles captured on the seized boat. [Israel Sun photo]

On Nov. 3, CTV.ca ran an AP report titled "Israel: Gaza rockets can reach metro Tel Aviv." It noted that, according to the head of Israeli Military Intelligence, Maj.-Gen. Amos Yadlin, Hamas successfully test-fired an Iranian rocket capable of flying 60 kilometres into the Mediterranean Sea. At that distance, it has the capacity to hit Tel Aviv, Israel's most populous urban centre.

According to AP, "[a]lthough the attacks have decreased dramatically – from 3,300 rockets and mortars fired in 2008 to 250 so far this year – Israeli officials say weapons continue to reach militants through tunnels under Gaza's border with Egypt."

Yadlin reportedly told Israel's foreign affairs and defence committee that Hamas has as many, if not more, rockets than it had before last winter's war.

The expanding range of Hamas rockets, together with approximately 40,000 Iranian and Syrian-supplied rockets, many of them long-range, in the hands of Hezbollah, poses a major, and growing, security challenge to Israel.

Iran's determination to keep funnelling rockets and other arms to terrorist organizations on Israel's doorstep is coupled with its attempts to frustrate the international community's efforts to rein in its nuclear program. It's no wonder that Israeli officials are urging that more attention be paid to Iran's intentions to destabilize the region and act on its stated aim to "wipe Israel off the map."

On a more positive note: In "Fish out of Water" (Oct. 29), the Economist looked at recent efforts (many of them faulty) by governments across the globe to promote entrepreneurship. It noted that the pre-eminent success story has been Israel: "The country that has led the world in promoting entrepreneurship has also done the most to plug itself into global markets. The Israeli government's venture-capital fund, which was founded in 1992 with $100 million of public money, was designed to attract foreign venture capital and, just as importantly, expertise. The government let foreigners decide what to invest in, and then stumped up a hefty share of the money required. Foreign venture capital poured into the country, high-tech companies boomed, domestic venture capitalists learned from their foreign counterparts and the government felt able to sell off the fund after just five years.

"Last year, Israel, a country of just over seven million people, attracted as much venture capital as France and Germany combined. Israel has more start-ups per head than any other country (a total of 3,850, or one for every 1,844 Israelis), and more companies listed on the NASDAQ exchange, a hub for fledgling technology firms, than China and India combined. It may not have the same comforting ring as 'the Swedish model' or 'the polder model,' but when it comes to promoting entrepreneurship, 'the Israeli model' is the one to emulate."

Birthright has more demand than availability

While acknowledging that the Birthright Israel program in North America has been tremendously successful in reconnecting "alienated" Jewish youth to the community, Bronfman and Solomon said they recognized the need to ratchet up the program to ensure they reach as many people as possible.

Bronfman said although many programs have been put in place to follow up with Birthright alumni in Toronto, Montreal and in the United States, there is still more demand than availability for the trip itself.

"The waiting list is inordinately large. And the problem is not just the waiting list, but fundamentally, only 20 per cent of those on that waiting list will ever go to Israel. We're losing [the other 80 per cent] from gaining the benefits of the trip," he said.

Bronfman noted it was his organization's hope that by 2015, the Birthright program would send 50 per cent of North American Jewish 18- to 26-year-olds on trips to Israel. He said he hoped by that time the trip would "become a rite of passage to adulthood," similar to the way bar and bat mitzvahs are viewed by the community at large.

"We know that about one-third of young Jews are essentially lost at this moment. They're not going to do anything Jewish," Solomon said. "If we can hit 50 per cent [on Birthright], there's another 10 to 15 per cent who had already gone to Israel, because they were on day school trips or with their college youth group… we would be getting as close to a universal connection as possible in a free society, by being able to bring the Birthright numbers up from [the current] 25 per cent of the cohort."

The major stumbling block is money, Solomon said. Money he and Bronfman hope will continue to flow in from donors and partners, and the future stewards of the community.

Speaking to that point, both men mentioned an endeavour called the Slingshot Fund. Established in 2005 by American Jews in their 20s and 30s, the fund "aims to provide a new model for raising and distributing grants by engaging people in Jewish philanthropy who would otherwise not be involved," according to ACBP's website.

Though Slingshot is still unavailable in Canada – ABCP recently established the program in Europe with the help of a consortium of funders – Bronfman said he would welcome any interest from Canadian funders to bring it north of the border.

Jeffrey Solomon

In its absence, a similar program is currently germinating in Montreal called "Gen J". It's the outgrowth of a partnership between Bronfman's philanthropies and Federation CJA, and is headed by Bronfman's son, Stephen, and his wife, Claudine.

Bronfman and Solomon said they have "great expectations" of this new initiative.

"It's an inter-generational program that veers away from the traditional young leadership programming that federations do," Solomon said. "They have brought in experts in generational programming and are being very careful to engage generations X and Y in the planning, so it doesn't become a top-down traditional program that only gets a very small niche."

The hope is that the program will extend across the community in Canada and eventually into the United States, Bronfman said.

In the meantime, the continued popularity of his Birthright Israel program and the positive ripple effect it is having on Jewish continuity pleases Bronfman.

"We got very lucky. We had no idea how it was going to turn out. It's incredible to see and revel in its success. And I'm very pleased as a Canadian to see every summer that consistently, the Canadian Birthright trips are rated the highest," he said. "We do know that the trip does reconnect participants who had been turned off the Jewish world. That is now not in question."

A recent Brandeis University study titled Generation Birthright Israel: The Impact of an Israel Experience on Jewish Identity and Choices concluded that "Birthright participants are significantly more likely to marry within the Jewish faith" than those who did not take the trip.

Canada Israel Experience awarded for excellence

Nation's leading Taglit-Birthright Israel trip provider tops in staff training

By Daniel Horowitz

Since the inception of Taglit-Birthright Israel in 1999, more than 12,000 young Torontonians have taken advantage of this unique and inspiring ten-day educational trip to Israel funded by the people of Israel through their government, local Jewish communities (in Toronto through UJA Federation) and leading Jewish philanthropists.

Of course, with the job of sending so many to the Jewish State comes a heavy responsibility: the responsibility of ensuring that they are overseen by properly educated and qualified trip leaders.

That's precisely where Canada Israel Experience (CIE) - a partnership of UIA Federations Canada and UJA Federation of Toronto, and the nation's leading Taglit Birthright Israel trip provider - comes in.

In fact, CIE was recently recognized and awarded a Certificate of Excellence by the international office of Taglit-Birthright Israel in staff development and training.

In selecting Canada Israel Experience for this honour, Taglit-Birthright Israel International cited a number of factors, including CIE's annual four-day staff training seminars for Canadian madrichim (leaders); its excellence in pre-trip training programs for overseas and Israeli staff; the integration of Israeli and overseas staff during trips; its ability to retain quality staff; and, its ongoing programs for staff.

"The Israeli and overseas staff that accompanies the BRI trip is one of the most important educational factors in the success of the experience," explains Elizabeth Sokolsky, VP Education & Operations, Taglit-Birthright Israel. "CIE has been a role model in staff training since the inception of the program. Their investment in ensuring that the staff on all Canadian programs are properly prepared and meet the highest of standards has resulted in a quality educational experience for our participants."

This fall, from September 10 to 13, Canada Israel Experience continued its unparalleled training methods with 58 candidates from across Canada who attended its annual training weekend in Quebec. The new crop of madrichim represented the full national spectrum: 36% were from Toronto, 24% from Montreal, and 40% from coast to coast communities.

The comprehensive four-day seminar focused on fives areas:

- Logistics
- Leadership
- Programming
- Community Building
- Jewish Knowledge

"The training weekend ended up being a lot more introspective than I expected it to be," says participant Jessica Taylor, 23. "I now have a much clearer understanding of my role as a madricha and how to lead participants on this Jewish experience. The weekend was also a great way to bond with fellow madrichim and I learned a good deal through our conversations, both formally and informally."

"CIE has always taken great pride in the training we offer to our madrichim," explains Michael Soberman, National Director, Canada Israel Experience. "Over the years, we have really invested in this area to ensure we send only the most qualified madrichim. We are so pleased and appreciative that Taglit-Birthright Israel International has recognized our accomplishments in this area."

Perspective

The Hill was alive with the sound of students

By Esther Mendelsohn

I was privileged to be a part of the Hillel of Greater Toronto student contingent which took to Parliament Hill for last week's Democracy in Action: Crisis in Iran conference in Ottawa. The conference was as timely as it was efficacious. A mere month after Iranian prime minister Ahmedinejad's vitriolic speech at the UN and the violent, despotic backlash to the courageous protests in Iran, the Canada-Israel Committee's (CIC) annual conference was aimed at informing, as well as enabling participants to take action. CIC is one of UJA Federation's advocacy partners, responsible for Canada-Israel relations.

The conference began with an impressive roster of speakers, which included among others, Israeli Ambassador to Canada Miriam Ziv, Jason Kenney, Minister of Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism, Professor Irwin Cotler, noted human rights activist, and the CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee Shimon Fogel.

Professor Cotler addressed the pivotal role of law in dealing with a lawless regime. Cotler was emphatic when he noted that through grassroots activism, "students will play an important role in... ensur(ing) Ahmedinejad's Iran is brought to... justice."

Students participating in Iran Conference in Ottawa.

Iranian pro-democracy activist Sayeh Hassan spoke with candour and passion and her words resounded well after the applause ended. I was moved by Hassan's wrenching stories of torture, massacres and Stalinist show trials. I was equally touched and encouraged when Hassan spoke of the valour embodied by young Iranians.

In a country where 70% of the population is under 25, it is critical that we support those young people who so thirst for change. This, as I told Senator Hugh Segal later in the day during our meeting, is what will make the democratic Iran of the future an even stronger and more genuine ally than the Iran of the Shah three decades past.

Following the speeches, we were given a taste of lobbying life. Conference participants broke into small groups and met with Parliamentarians to discuss Iran. The main thrust of the discussions was legislation that reaffirms Canada's commitment to democratic values and to the people of Iran. For many students, this was the first time on the Hill and their first time lobbying. Even for the more seasoned activists, this proved to be a highlight of the conference.

Hillel of Greater Toronto, UJA Federation's partner student organization, sponsored and coordinated student attendance. Students not only participated in this year's conference, we comprised approximately one half of the conference's attendees. Inasmuch as the focus of the conference was the threat of a nuclear Iran, the demographics of the attendees sent a clear message: the student voice is a valuable one. Indeed, it will be my generation - in Iran and in Canada - which will prompt the change about which politicians so often speak.

Esther Mendelsohn is a former IDF combat sergeant and a third year student at Ryerson who joined other students at the conference through financial support from CIJA (Canadian Council for Israel & Jewish Advocacy) and CIC.

Holocaust Education Week

Fraudulent Protocols widely accepted by anti-Semites

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For a document that has been repeatedly debunked, exposed, adjudicated and dismantled, The Protocols of the Elders of Zion continues to show remarkable resilience.

Once the centrepiece of the Nazis' anti-Semitic propaganda, it remains a best-seller in the Arab world. It's also available through book distributors in the West, including Canada, and it forms part of Hamas' genocidal covenant.

Even national leaders such as the president of Malaysia have adopted its premise that Jews are bent on world domination, said Hadassa Ben Itto, a former Israeli judge.

Author of The Lie That Wouldn't Die: The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, Ben Itto was in Toronto recently for Holocaust Education Week. In a Nov. 3 address to a lunchtime audience at the law offices of Minden Gross, she suggested that the best way to address the Protocols' wide availability is through court challenges.

"How do you fight a lie? How do you combat a big libel?" Ben Itto asked.

"The only thing to do is to take the distributors of the Protocols to courts of law. Courts of law are the only forums where you can prove your case and bring all evidence, and if it's a big enough trial, the media will cover it."

Ben Itto, past president of the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists (IAJLJ), said the book's bogus origins were established in landmark cases earlier last century. Zionist leaders Chaim Weizmann and Nahum Sokolow both testified that contrary to allegations of the time, the Protocols were not adopted at the first Zionist Congress in Basel in 1897.

Automaker Henry Ford published numerous anti-Semitic tracts, including the Protocols, in the Dearborn Independent and was taken to court for his writings. The notorious anti-Semite settled the case before trial, in part by burning "truckloads" of books, Ben Itto said.

All cases that preceded the rise of Hitler to power were settled, she continued, but the Nazis' tactic was to refuse to settle. Instead, they used the courts to promote their message.

In Switzerland, meanwhile, shortly after the Nazis took power in Germany, a creative lawyer used the country's obscenity legislation to launch a case with the Protocols as the centrepiece.

The trial saw historians, politicians, members of the Czar's cabinet and other Russian insiders testify as to the fraudulent origins of the Protocols, which emerged in pre-revolutionary Russia. The historical origins of the Protocols were established, and even though the Jewish plaintiffs lost on appeal – the court ruled the obscenity law was not aimed at literature, but at pornography – the historical record was set straight, Ben Itto said.

In 1934, South African civil and criminal cases turned on the false allegation by local Nazis that plans to dominate South Africa were found in a Port Elizabeth synagogue. The court eventually found a "Greyshirt" Nazi guilty of perjury and forgery regarding the alleged Jewish plot and sentenced him to six years hard labour.

The Protocols were banned in the country, and in 1991, when the post-apartheid government sought to un-ban it (along with many other books), a case launched by the IAJLJ succeeded in keeping the book on the prohibited list, Ben Itto said.

That same year, a Russian court considered a case involving the anti-Semitic organization, Pamyat, and found against the group, which had relied on the Protocols for support.

Ben Itto noted that the Nazis employed the Protocols as a lethal weapon, and with their defeat, "the ones who picked up the torch were Muslim extremists… The charter of Hamas gives the Protocols as a reason to exterminate Jews."

The Protocols can be traced back to a much more benign political satire written in mid-19th century France. Concerned over offending the reigning monarch, Napoleon III, satirist Maurice Joly penned an allegorical work, Dialogue in Hell Between Machiavelli and Montesquieu, in which neither Jews nor Zionism were mentioned.

Authors of the Protocols lifted two-thirds of that book virtually word for word and it was used to blame Russia's revolutionary movement on the Jews. That prompted numerous bloody pogroms, and after World War I, the hoax spread into Europe and linked the Jews to the prevailing "Red scare" of the day.

Ben Itto's address was sponsored by the Speakers Action Group and the Canadian Jewish Civil Rights Association.

German town holds vast records of victims' names

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Funded solely by Germany and managed by the Red Cross, the International Tracing Service (ITS) in Bad Arolsen, Germany, has built up a vast names index of more than 50 million reference cards pertaining to some 17.5 million people, mostly victims of the Holocaust and family members who made inquiries about missing relatives after the war.

The word "victim" doesn't refer only to people who perished in the Holocaust, explained Israeli genealogist Michael Goldstein during his well-attended talk about the ITS documents at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue on Nov. 4 as part of Holocaust Education Week. "People who were displaced and did survive – they, too, were the victims," he said.

Opened to researchers since 2006, the vast repository of Holocaust-related records that the ITS has accumulated and generated since 1955 is contained in five office buildings, some of which are crammed wall to wall with filing cabinets. The ITS has about 400 employees and is governed by an international committee of 11 countries, Goldstein said.

The ITS documents have been scanned and may also be searched at both the Yad Vashem Museum in Jerusalem and the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington D.C., Goldstein said, adding, however, that, by agreement, they will never be posted on the Internet. The documents include incarceration lists, transport lists, medical assessments and hospital records, prisoner of war and displaced person records, birth, marriage and death records, ship manifests and much more.

Michael Goldstein

Some people have found handwritten letters their parents had written, describing their experiences in the war. One researcher found "a postcard written from a sister to a brother from one displaced person camp to another," he said. "That's a letter that the family would never have seen. Now it's available."

When Goldstein visited Bad Arolsen a couple of years ago as part of a group of 40 researchers, the ITS assigned a team of 20 staff members, including translators, to assist them. "They tried to be as helpful as possible. Some of them had been working there for 20 or 30 years and had never had [face-to-face] contact with researchers before."

Tracing Service documents may be searched at Yad Vashem

Two hours north of Frankfurt by train, the town was at the juncture of the American, Russian, French and British zones at the end of World War II. The former home of an SS training school, it became the headquarters of the Allied Expeditionary Forces near the end of the war. The ITS was established there with records assembled by the American, British and French forces. The Russians, however, took their war-related documents back to Russia.

The original mandate of the ITS was to register Holocaust victims, but it later began helping to reunite families. Whereas once it typically took two or three years to reply to a letter of inquiry, today its usual response time is six to 12 weeks, and it has cleared up a backlog of more than 200,000 inquiries. Goldstein advised researchers to write the ITS as an efficient means of retrieving information about the fate and whereabouts of family members during and after the war.

The ITS hosts monthly guided tours for visitors, and all research is done by appointment only, Goldstein said. Recalling his own warm reception there, he cautioned that the ITS may be becoming less welcoming to visitors than when it first opened its doors to researchers in 2006.

Born in Toronto and raised in Montreal, Goldstein is a Jerusalem-based genealogist who is president of both the Israel Genealogical Society and the International Association of Jewish Genealogical Societies. His talk – Documenting the Fate of the Victims: Researching the Records of the International Tracing Service in Bad Arolsen, Germany – was hosted by the Jewish Genealogical Society of Toronto.

Holocaust Education Week

Survivors found to be full of hope, resilience

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Paula David feels lucky to have been able to interview 10 aging Holocaust survivors.

A lecturer in gerontology and clinical practice at the University of Toronto's faculty of social work, David interviewed the group, who all happened to be female, about their views on their own aging and end of life as part of research for her doctoral thesis.

Speaking at Baycrest as part of Holocaust Education Week, David, who worked at Baycrest for 20 years with Holocaust survivors and their families, said that she became interested in the topic because, "of the handful of people who [survived the war], only some are left. They are our legacy and our hope to connect to the future."

Older Holocaust survivors have unique challenges, she said, and "it is our job to understand them and give them the best possible care so they can have as dignified and peaceful end of life as possible. If anyone deserves this, it is this group who has seen such horrendous [things.]"

When speaking to them, she said, it's important to appreciate their early years, along with the end of their life. "The Holocaust is not the only thing that happened to them. They had life before and after."

Looking at as many relevant studies as she could find, she said, she discovered that in the 1960s, for example, Holocaust survivors were expected to live difficult lives.

We have since learned, though, "that not only have they lived, they have lived full lives, even with their memories and pain. Now we look at how resilient these people are."

She said she spoke to a diverse group of women – of different ages and from four different countries, with different war experiences – and found a common thread.

"We wanted to be there for them in this last chapter. [They all saw] the dark potential of man, and they've come back. It was important for us to find their humanity and make sure it shines through."

David said she was surprised at how articulate the women were. "One woman told me that no matter what she lived through, the loss of her husband [in later years] was the worst. She said that after the war she was left with nothing and nobody, but she found her husband. When he died, she had nobody left."

When she asked another women about her feelings of hope, "she told me that if there is no hope, you are not a person any more, and then you're dead."

David said that in serving the needs of survivors in their old age, "we need to be there the way people want us to be there. We have to look at their end-of-life directives. They have a voice, and they deserve to be heard."

In her interviews, David said, she realized that some people agreed to talk just because they wanted a visit. "Loneliness is a driving force behind a lot of people willing to talk."

Our job, she said, is to make sure that someone cares. "We have services for aging survivors, but there are not enough. We have a huge obligation."

She said she came away from her work inspired by how the women were willing to talk about their lives. "This is our last tribute, a way to honour the survivors. If we want to be there for people and make them feel dignified, then we have to talk about it."

BUDDIES MAKE BUTTERFLIES: United Synagogue Day School head of school Claire Sumerlus helps David Alcon, left, and his buddy Mitchell Wolfman create butterflies as part of USDS Bayview's Buddy Day, which aimed to teach lessons in tikkun olam. Eighteen of these butterflies, when finished, will be sent to join the thousands of butterflies decorating the San Diego Jewish Academy's wall of Zikaron L'Tikvah, which commemorates the 1.5 million children killed in the Holocaust.

As Winter Approaches Another Kind of Freeze May Be In Order

Marc Weisman, LLB, Torkin Manes LLP

This is the first in a series of articles that I and my colleagues, Sabina Mexis and Risa Awerbuck, are writing on ways to organize your financial affairs in a tax-efficient manner. This article focuses on the looming tax burden faced by business owners whose businesses have appreciated in value. In the current economy, an estate freeze can be an attractive option.

The Looming Tax Burden

Sonja and Hy Rosenberg own a business that has steadily appreciated in value since they started it. On Hy's death, ownership passes to Sonja and the business continues to flourish with the active involvement of their three children. Sonja leaves the business to the children in her will, but they are shocked to find on her death that the estate is liable for a whopping capital gains tax bill.

Without proper estate planning, estates that include incorporated businesses that have appreciated in value are subject to significant tax liabilities. Upon the owner's death, any increase in the value of the company's shares since purchase or incorporation will be subject to tax as a capital gain. Tax may be deferred by leaving the shares of the corporation to a spouse, but when that spouse dies, the tax liability will ultimately resurface. Even if the business qualifies for the $750,000 capital gains exemption for Canadian small business shares, the estate may be left with significant tax liabilities when it passes to the next generation.

What Can be Done?

One advantage of today's economy is that business owners can freeze their estate values at today's (presumably lower) values. An estate freeze is a restructuring of the company's ownership: the owner gives back to the company common shares (i.e., growth shares) in exchange for preferred voting shares with a fixed value (i.e., shares that do not grow in value). The value of the preferred shares will be fixed at the fair market value of the common shares immediately prior to the freeze. New, nominal value, common shares of the company can then be issued to the children.

Any increase in the company's value from the date of the restructuring will now accrue to the common shares, held by the children. There will be no capital gains tax exposure on these new common shares until the children sell or transfer them, or die. The fixed value preferred shares still entitle the owner to receive preferentially from the company an amount equal to the fixed value of his or her preferred shares. In addition, since the preferred shares have voting rights, the owner retains control over how the company is run. Preferred shares can also pay a fixed or variable dividend, enabling the owner to draw an income from the company's business activities.

In the above example, let's say that the business is worth $5 million today. Hy freezes his equity in the company by "returning" $5 million-worth of common shares to the company in exchange for $5 million-worth of preferred voting shares. Each of his children acquire, nominal value, common shares worth $1. Over the next ten years, the worth of the business appreciates to $15 million. Hy's fixed value preferred shares are still worth only $5 million, so on the death of Sonja, the estate pays capital gains only on the $5 million, minus the $750,000 capital gains exemption.

In a more sophisticated tax-driven structure, the new common shares of the company could be held by a trust of which the owner(s), their spouse and/or their children could be beneficiaries, rather than the children holding the shares directly.

Primary Benefits of an Estate Freeze

1. It freezes the value of the shares at their current value, effectively freezing the tax liability that will be incurred upon the owner's death, or sale or transfer of the shares.

2. It transfers the future increase in the company's value to the owner's children.

3. It enables the owner to retain control over the company during his or her lifetime.

4. It allows the owner to draw an income from the company's activities.

Additional Benefits

1. In the absence of an estate freeze, only the owner can use the $750,000 capital gains exemption. If shares are owned by several family members or a family trust, each family member has a chance to use the $750,000 capital gains exemption. This can mean the difference between paying substantial taxes on the sale or transfer of the business, or upon the owner's death, versus paying no or substantially reduced tax.

2. The owner can split income with his or her children (spouse and grandchildren if a family trust is used). If any of those family members pay tax at a lower rate than the company or the owner, distributing corporate earnings to them in this fashion will reduce the overall tax payable for your family. Many business owners access corporate funds via a family trust in this way on a tax-free or tax-reduced basis to pay for their children's or grandchildren's university education.

An Estate Freeze is Timely

It is timely to do an estate freeze now, because your business may be fixed at a lower value given the current economic environment. In addition, even if you have previously taken advantage of an estate freeze, now is an opportune time to "refreeze" at a lower value. This will allow you to further reduce the tax exposure on the value of your business upon your death, or sale or transfer of the shares.

Restitution keeps Shoah memories alive, university professor argues

By MICHAEL ISENBERG
Special to The CJN

Securing reparations for Nazi crimes in World War II isn't about money, it's about the preservation of Holocaust memories, University of Toronto historian Michael Marrus claimed in a Nov. 3 Holocaust Education Week lecture at Holy Blossom Temple.

Based on his new book Some Measure of Justice: The Holocaust-Era Restitution Campaign of the 1990s, Marrus, the Chancellor Rose and Ray Wolfe Professor Emeritus of Holocaust Studies at U of T, laid out his controversial argument after first discussing other takes on the matter.

Marrus analyzed several theories about the importance and necessity of restitution in the eyes of Holocaust victims, survivors and their families. He spoke of claims against large companies, including Swiss banks and German corporations.

"An important and recurring theme [in many claims was] that firms during the Holocaust were not only about murder, but also making money [through] exploitation, slave labour and corruption," he said.

But he said this is a "dubious exercise historically," because German firms weren't actually making much money from the Nazis' policies and reign, and many firms were ruined entirely by the end of the war.

He also said that historians cite the transfer of property from victims to the Third Reich as a reason for restitution claims.

However, Marrus said, "confiscation" of Jewish wealth was mostly perpetrated by ordinary Germans through purchases and transactions – and to a lesser degree through theft – and not by the Nazis and big German industry.

Michael Marrus

He mentioned the high legal fees for claims as another indication that restitution is not primarily about money.

Eventually, he supplied his own theory. "It's about justice. Even though it's objectionable, nevertheless it's something about survivors and their thirst [for justice]," he said.

"But what do we mean by justice after such a long time?" he asked.

The answer has to do with the difference between history and memory.

While history is analytical, requiring evidence to assess and determine facts, memory – of an individual or of a collective – is about recalling significant events in the past that are considered important to keep alive, he said.

"People say that restitution is to honour the past. History is fact, not honour. Remembering is honour," Marrus said.

"Why should it matter now? After all, these people seeking claims were almost certainly born after the war. Because it has to do with most survivors [and their family's] view on justice. It's [about] the thirst of public recognition of the terrible assaults that occurred."

Marrus stressed that, while there may be a distinction between people's claims and history, people were, nonetheless, persecuted and deserve appropriate acknowledgement and means of reparation, whatever that may be.

He concluded by acknowledging that the true intentions of restitution may "ultimately be ambiguous," but he reiterated that he believes money isn't the ultimate point.

"Successful outcome of reparation struggles is to create a collective consciousness and understanding of the terrible experiences that happened to [Holocaust victims], with no detail deliberately unreported. And with this urge of publicity comes a sense that it will all be forgotten unless it's taught and spoken about."

Play, exhibit focus on Polish doctor's respect for kids

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Janusz Korczak, a doctor who ran an orphanage in prewar Poland and became known as a hero of the Warsaw Ghetto, is the subject of a new Canadian play and an art exhibit here that are part of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa's 2009 Holocaust Education Week.

Korczak was know for his respectful treatment of children. One of his orphans, Leon Gluzman, a founding partner of the local accounting firm Ginsburg, Gluzman, Fage and Levitz (GGFL), is known here not only for his professional accomplishments but also for his family's dedication and contributions to the community.

The new play, The Children's Republic, is based on Gluzman's years living in Korczak's orphanage. It opened at the Great Canadian Theatre Company on Nov. 3 and continues until Nov. 22.

When Gluzman arrived in Ottawa as a child, leaving behind his widowed mother and sister, he was determined to save enough money to have them join him later. Unfortunately, fate intervened and they both perished in the Holocaust. Adding to the tragedy was the fact that the family had intended to immigrate to Canada several years before, but the death of his 30-year-old father left his mother in dire straits. Unable to emigrate, or even to provide for her small family, Gluzman's mother arranged for him to live in the Jewish orphanage run by Korczak.

Gluzman, landlord and supporter of The Ottawa School of Speech and Drama (OSSD), often dropped in to visit and developed a special relationship with the students and the school's artistic director, Amanda Lewis. He shared stories of his childhood in the orphanage and how it was run by Korczak, an advocate for children's rights.

The children decided to develop the story into a theatrical production, and "what was strikingly unique about the project was that the process came to mirror the very ideals espoused by Korczak," Lewis said. "The children, given respect and encouragement, took the lead and quickly showed us a version of orphanage life from their perspective."

The drama school and the Great Canadian Theatre Company commissioned award-winning playwright Hannah Moscovitch, a former student of OSSD, to write a play based on the children's workshops, and The Children's Republic was born.

In conjunction with the play, and sponsored in part by the Gluzman family, an exhibit is on display at the Irving Greenberg Theatre Centre. "Champion of the Child: Janusz Korczak," created by the Jewish Museum of London, England, is an exhibit in words and pictures that tells the story of Korczak (born Henryk Goldsmit), the Polish-Jewish physician, author and educator who devoted his life to the rights and well-being of children. Korczak perished during the Holocaust when he refused offers of help for himself and led 200 of the children in his care through the streets of the Warsaw Ghetto to the train that took them to Treblinka and their deaths.

The exhibit was brought to Ottawa in collaboration with the Shoah Committee of Ottawa. For more information about the play, the exhibit or the schedule of activities for Holocaust Education Week in Ottawa, visit www.jewishottawa.com.

With Beyond America's Grasp: A Century of Failed Diplomacy in the Middle East, Stephen P. Cohen shows that, following the United States's ascent to the role of superpower, there has been a record of missteps and about-faces, often stemming from the ideological conflict of Wilsonian multilateralism and the more aggressive foreign policy advocated by Theodore Roosevelt. Cohen traces the history of America's dealings with each of the individual states in the Middle East, demonstrating that the fallout from failed policies often disrupted development. Beyond America's Grasp is a timely look at the important history and issues of the Middle East that must be understood if we are truly to make a new beginning.

Nova Scotia teachers attend Holocaust workshop

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Naomi Azrieli excitedly opens a Holocaust education workshop.

"This is the first workshop for educators we have done outside Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver," she says proudly, welcoming 70 Halifax-area teachers to two sessions at the Nova Scotia Teachers Union building in Halifax. The program is part of Holocaust Education Week in Halifax, promoted by the Atlantic Jewish Council.

Azrieli is executive director and chair, as well as senior editor of books, for the Azrieli Foundation, founded in 1987 by her father, Holocaust survivor and developer David Azrieli. It promotes many programs, including the Azrieli Series of Holocaust Survivor Memoirs, a series of books written by survivors and geared to high school students. Teachers use the books to provide Holocaust education programs.

In 1939, David Azrieli fled his native Poland at age 17, remaining a step ahead of the Nazis through Russia and Central Asia, and arriving in Palestine in 1942, where he studied at Technion-Israel Institute of Technology in Haifa.

In 1948, he joined the Israel Defence Forces and fought in Israel's War of Independence. After the war, he lived in South Africa, England and the United States before settling in Canada in 1954. His two companies – Montreal-based Canpro Investments Ltd. and the Tel Aviv-based Azrieli Group – are considered leaders in their fields.

"My father wanted to help Canadian survivors publish their memoirs so the stories wouldn't be lost," says Naomi Azrieli, who has a PhD in history from Oxford University and has taught at McMaster University and the University of Toronto.

"He didn't speak about his experiences for 30 years but, after re-visiting Poland and Russia in the late 1980s, decided to write his own story in 1990. It took him 10 years but Yad Vashem [in Jerusalem] was interested and published it immediately, something that was unusual, because most survivors never get their stories published."

David Azrieli wanted to help survivors living in Canada publish their stories. In 2007, after a call for submissions, Naomi and the foundation received many memoirs, "some only 10 pages, some as many as 800 pages, all with a unique perspective," she says.

In 2007, the first series of seven books was launched, followed by eight more books last January – many in English and French. All are free to teachers and students.

The foundation produced resource guides to enable teachers to guide their students to Holocaust understanding – its causes, events and results.

Lisa Black-Meddings, a Toronto high school history teacher, consulted on developing the teaching guide. She conducted an afternoon session in Halifax, with 25 teachers attending. More than 45 were at her evening program.

She shows the teachers how these Holocaust memoirs can be used in English, history, civics, social studies and creative writing classes. She describes how the books can be used as memoirs, diaries, and even emotional backgrounds to the survivor's new perspectives of life and death.

Leah Ann Cameron, a social studies teacher at Leslie Thomas Junior High in Sackville, N.S., has touched on the Holocaust with her Grade 8 and 9 students, usually over a one-month period.

"This is a very detailed lesson plan, because a teacher helped prepare it," she says. "I've been looking for ways to give the program the justice it deserves. These memoirs and the guide certainly will enable me to improve what I've been doing."

Cameron teaches in a French immersion school and states, "It's good to see this available in French, too."

Monica Rojo, a Grade 7-12 Spanish and French teacher at Sacred Heart School in Halifax, attended Holocaust Education Week programs last year in Halifax and expressed enthusiasm about this year's events.

"I was excited to attend because our school devotes time to teach about tolerance. Today's program will certainly better enable me to teach my students."

Mariel Fogel, 18, a member of Hillel in Calgary, sees this as a good sign.

"One of the main things about this – the older generation, they are guests, but this is really for us," she said of the GA.

Kelly Castiel, 45, of Montreal's Federation CJA agrees.

"We're exposing them to a lot of things [at the assembly]," she said. "We need youth to take over… it's the continuity of the Jewish People."

Howard Krosnick, also of Federation CJA in Montreal, saw the event as a way to reconnect, both with youth and with colleagues.

"To recognize what it is we have in common is just really critical," Krosnick, 63, said. "It's a global world. What happens in Toronto… has impacts in Montreal. We have to share information and to share our best experiences."

For Michael Oren, Israel's ambassador to the United States, the assembly also meant sharing his worst experiences.

Obama was scheduled to meet with Jewish leaders

"I have lost a sister-in-law to suicide bombing," he told the crowd at the opening plenary on Sunday. "Our eldest son was wounded in battle. My family and I have lived through successive wars."

And yet, Oren said, he still believes in God's plan. He also believes in Israel.

"Think back to Israel in 1967, surrounded by hostile neighbours with no international allies… Look at Israel today…with a robust economy… Israel is an incomparable success story," he said, adding that unity is vital in Jewish communities.

"It's a fact that whenever Jews have remained united, not only in their faith, not only in their God, but most of all, in themselves as a people, we have overcome… challenges and we have flourished."

Howard English, vice-president of marketing and communications for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, saw the assembly as a statement.

"I think at a time when Israel is under constant threat… it's an important statement to make for Jews to come together to demonstrate the power of collective action," he said.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was scheduled to address the GA on Monday, and U.S. President Barack Obama was to speak on Tuesday. However, Obama was forced to withdraw in order to attend a memorial service at Fort Hood, Texas, for the 13 people gunned down at the U.S. Army base there on Nov. 5, a statement Saturday night from the Jewish Federations of North America said.

Obama and Netanyahu were to meet Monday in Washington, a White House official said Sunday, and Rahm Emanuel, the White House chief of staff, was to speak Tuesday in Obama's stead. Obama was also scheduled to meet Monday with a group of leaders from the organization. — With files from JTA

Task force focuses on anti-Semitism

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Hasbara at York and Hasbara Fellowships are asking York University students to speak up about anti-Semitism on campus, because they feel the administration still isn't doing enough about it.

Hasbara has established a task force, made up of 11 Hasbara members and five people from outside the York community, to collect stories from Jewish students about their experiences at York.

Earlier this year, York convened its own task force – called the Presidential Task Force on Student Life, Learning and Community at York University – in response to rising tensions between pro- and anti-Israel students on campus.

The York task force considered a report from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Hasbara at York, Hillel at York and the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy. The York task force's recommendations were presented to president Mamdouh Shoukri this past summer. Among them were creating a committee to promote open discussion and expanding York's student code of conduct.

For Tyler Golden, Hasbara at York's co-president, the recommendations didn't go far enough.

"The task force didn't really touch on [anti-Semitism] at all. It was a general overview on the issue," he said. "The needs of Jewish students were not adequately addressed."

Hasbara is accepting online submissions, but 30 to 40 York students who were affected by anti-Semitism shared their experiences with its task force on Oct. 26.

"Basically, we wanted to facilitate an opportunity for those who otherwise would not have a chance to speak up," Golden said, adding that York takes too long to deal with complaints.

'We have absolutely zero tolerance for any harassment'

"What should be a very short process… really is taking months at a time," he said.

Patrick Monahan, York's provost and the chair of the school's task force, said he's aware of the wait-time issue.

"I think that's been a problem in the past," he said. "We have absolutely zero tolerance for any harassment… if there are incidents, as there always will be, they will be dealt with appropriately."

After Hasbara's task force has collected testimonies, it will present its results to York's administration, with recommendations for improvement, Golden said.

Jennifer Diamond, Hillel's assistant director for Israel affairs, acknowledged that students can get frustrated while waiting for a resolution to their complaints, although she added that Hillel is often a part of the process at York.

"When incidents do happen, often Hillel is the first line of defence… If students come to us with a complaint, we find out what happens… we help them through the university complaint process," she said.

When a student complains, they must fill out an online form and wait for a response from the university.

"We've heard that in the last year or so, the administration has often been a bit quicker in terms of response time," Diamond said. "I do think that, obviously, there's a large number of complaints, not just from the Jewish community, [from] everybody on campus."

Still, Diamond admits there's room for improvement.

"We see there's a need for something to happen if we participated in [the university's] task force," Diamond said. "I think that all students want to see positive change on their campus… Students have a need for an outlet."

Golden said Hasbara's task force can provide that outlet.

"[Anti-Semitism] is a real issue. Broad examples are being called a dirty Jew…references to the Holocaust, not being allowed to wear an [Israel Defence Forces] T-shirt in class and general intimidation on campus," he said. "We've actually been overwhelmed with responses."

Jewish teacher education program gets new director

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

For Laura Wiseman, a career in Jewish education is a "very integrated" way of living.

"Jewish people learn in their homes and live in their schools, and vice versa," the new director of York University's Jewish teacher education program told The CJN in a recent interview. The program – which offers a BA and B.Ed. and qualifies students to teach in Jewish day schools – is the only one of its kind in Ontario and one of only two in Canada, along with a similar program at McGill University, where Wiseman did her own teacher training.

Wiseman, 52, took on her new role in July after serving as acting director for the previous year.

A former teacher, branch principal, and director of Jewish studies for three campuses at United Synagogue Day School, she has worked as an adjunct professor and practicum co-ordinator for the program since 2002, and was seconded from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Board of Jewish Education in 2004 to co-ordinate it when former director Alex Pomson – now based at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem's Melton Center for Jewish Education – made aliyah.

Laura Wiseman [Frances Kraft photo]

"Growing" the program at York is a priority for Wiseman. With 23 students – mostly alumni of Jewish day schools – the program is "on a rebound," although it's still smaller than it was when Pomson came to Toronto in 1996 and there were 29 students.

But because the program is "advising-intensive," it shouldn't become too large, Wiseman cautioned. However, she is looking at options such as opening it to people who have a BA and want to pursue a B.Ed. and Jewish studies, so they can teach in a Jewish school, and expanding services to those who are already working as teachers.

As well, she said, there is "the beginning of an option to do the program part-time."

She calls Jewish day school teachers "unsung heroes" for hosting the students for up to year to provide practical experience and feedback.

Opportunities for job placement have been good, according to Wiseman. "Just about everyone who wanted a school job has gotten one."

On the other hand, she said she has noted an increase in the number of students continuing on to graduate studies, and also in those who are pursuing careers in "experiential"

Survivor humanizes Holocaust at Centennial

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Robert Melson is a Holocaust survivor, but he says he's not a hero or a martyr. He's simply human.

"Let our faults stick out," he told a crowd of several dozen people at Centennial College's Progress Avenue campus last Thursday. "They only make us real."

Melson, a professor emeritus at Purdue University, is the author of False Papers Deception and Survival in the Holocaust, a memoir that tells the story of how his family survived the war by impersonating a Polish Catholic family.

"I was two when the war started, eight when it ended," Melson told the crowd. "I was a little Polish, Catholic anti-Semite in the war."

During the lecture, which was part of Centennial's annual Holocaust education week, the author read an excerpt from an interview with his mother that explained how she had convinced a priest that she was a Polish aristocrat who had lost her identity papers.

"The Jews were sentenced to death… These were passes to life," his mother had said of the papers, which held the name Zamojskis.

This was the last name that saved Melson's life, but he said it was also the name that threatened to destroy his Jewish identity. When Melson was eight, his father asked him what religion he believed in.

"I believe in Jesus," he answered.

"You don't believe in Jesus," his father said. "You're Jewish."

For Melson, who only learned that he was Jewish at that moment, his religion is a bittersweet treasure chest.

"My only sense of being Jewish came from [the fact] that we had survived the war," he said, adding that, after the war, when his family moved to the United States, he attended Hebrew school in New York City.

"I loved it. It was wonderful. To me, being Jewish was not being afraid. It was something positive. It was something I had to work on."

Throughout the lecture, and also throughout his memoir, Melson refused to turn his parents, who have passed away, into saints.

"I wished to be as truthful as I could," he told the audience, adding that, for example, before the war, his mother had rejected a possible suitor because he "looked too Jewish."

"I was startled that my mother had a streak of Jewish self-hate… I left these things in."

For Rachel Iskov, who attended the lecture and is co-chair of Holocaust education week for the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, the lecture helped humanize the Shoah.

"I think every story is important… If there are three million survivors, there are three million stories," she said.

To Iskov, understanding the Holocaust means hearing personal stories rather than broad facts.

"They don't just become the survivor," they become people. When we humanize [Holocaust survivors], it has so much meaning," she said.

For Gladys Watson, director of the learning and resource centres at Centennial, events such as Melson's lecture create an open conversation between the audience and the speaker.

"Not everyone has heard about the Holocaust… It's important to provide an opportunity for… discussion," she said. "We're providing a… learning opportunity that is unique."

education such as working in summer camps or with youth groups.

For students who are considering the program, but who may have concerns about anti-Israel political activity on campus, Wiseman said she wants people to understand that York University "is a safe place, and there is freedom of expression."

As well, she said, she wants to "heighten the profile and panache of being a Jewish educator."

Wiseman noted that Toronto is "among the few cities in North America that remunerates teachers in the Jewish day school system well. There's a well-developed salary scale, and I think we need to develop a respect that goes with it as well."

Status of familial monetary gifts prior to divorce

Family Matters

John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

Question: I am contemplating divorce after separation from my wife for over two years, without any written agreement. If I have to send some money to support my parents in paying doctors' fees, will that be considered wrongful alienation of my assets or improper transferring property to a third party?

Answer: No. Had you transferred assets or money to your parents just prior to your separation, a judge may have viewed such a transfer with suspicion as an attempt to divert assets that should properly have been split 50:50 with her. However, two years after separation is perfectly within your rights to do as you wish with your own assets, so long as you report your income accurately when calculating it for child/spousal support. Also report the state of your assets and liabilities accurately as they existed on the date of separation and the date of marriage to calculate what, if any, "equalization payment" or property split you owe each other. But the calculation is based upon the value of your respective net worth positions as of the date of separation, not now.

Moreover, if you had legitimate reasons for transferring money to your parents to support them even just before the date of separation, and you could prove that you were not doing so to divert assets away from your wife's right to an equal split of property, then a court would likely excuse your actions in any event.

Question: I'm self-employed and in 2007 I made a great deal more in income then in 2006 or 2008. But my wife's lawyer insists that she's going to calculate the amount of child and spousal support based on the income I reported in the latest tax returns filed (2008). Is this fair? Is this what the courts are going to do when calculating child and spousal support?

Answer: No. The court should either look at your most recent income (2008) or at the very least should average your past three years income if your income goes "up and down" or fluctuates because of the nature of your income.

'Aviation is not just a man's world,' says female El Al pilot

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Smadar Shechter shattered the glass ceiling in Israel and thereby struck a historic blow for women's rights in the Jewish state.

Shortly after joining Arkia Israel Airlines as a first officer in 1998, she had the honour of becoming the first female commercial pilot in Israel to be promoted to captain.

And now, 11 years on, she is working for El Al Airlines, Israel's flagship carrier, as a first officer.

"Aviation isn't just a man's world," she said in an interview. "Not really."

She was interviewed during a recent layover in Toronto, where she spoke about her unusual achievements at a venue sponsored by the Canada Israel Chamber of Commerce, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Israel Forum of Canada.

A sixth-generation sabra on her late father's side, and the mother of two young daughters, Daniella and Liah, Shechter joined El Al in November 2002 after flying for Arkia for four years.

By reaching high, she fulfilled a childhood dream, but her path to the pilot's cockpit was long and and circuitous.

Now 38, she was smitten by flying at the age of 12, when she accompanied her parents on her maiden flight, a 19-hour trip to South Africa.

Delighted to be sitting in an airplane, she asked her father, an economist, a litany of questions about the intricacies of aviation. On subsequent flights to different destinations, she got to sit in the cockpit.

Always technically minded and drawn to tinkering with and fixing things, she was fascinated by the mechanics of flying.

"I like this machine," she said, referring to airplanes.

Schechter's love affair with airplanes manifested itself when she was about to be called up for national service

Before being conscripted in 1989, she dashed off letters to the Israeli Air Force, hoping to gain acceptance into the difficult pilot's course.

She was fobbed off with the standard explanation that women were not eligible for combat roles.

Thwarted by such outmoded regulations, she deferred her dream and served as an operations co-ordinator in an F-15 squadron.

Due to a subsequent Israeli Supreme Court ruling, women were eventually allowed to apply for the course to which she could only aspire.

Having needlessly lost the opportunity to be a combat pilot, Shechter did not despair. Buoyed by hope, she signed up for private lessons, where she mastered both theory and flying.

During this six-year period as an apprentice aviatrix, she also studied economics at the College of Management in Tel Aviv and worked as a bank analyst.

In the meantime, she married Yair Eini, a real estate developer in Israel and Europe.

At Arkia Israel Airlines, she usually flew the Tel Aviv-Eilat route. After about a year and a half, she earned her captain's wings, an heretofore unprecedented feat for a woman in Israel.

Having amassed 1,000 hours of flying time, she applied for a first officer's job at El Al and got it. She was not exactly an unknown quantity, having met some of its pilots.

Shechter, however, was not the first female pilot hired by El Al. Merav Schwartz preceded her by a year, and she, too, is a first officer.

As a first officer, Shechter performs the same functions as the captain. They share flying duties, as well as takeoffs and landings.

"We both have to know how to fly the plane," she said. "But the captain is the commander and he has the last word when decisions are made. That's the biggest difference between us."

She flies either a Boeing 757 or a Boeing 767, each of which carries 200 passengers and a crew. On average, she is on duty twice a week. Schechter's longest flight takes her from Tel Aviv to Toronto.

Her mother, Elka, who hails from the Caribbean island of Curacao, accompanies her occasionally. "She's my best friend," said Shechter, whose hobbies include horseback riding, calisthenics and interior design.

More often than not, she is away from her family about 14 days a month. For the past decade, she has lived on Moshav Tal Shachar, near Rehovot, where her husband was born.

"When I'm in Israel, I have all the time for my children. They were born into this situation, so it's a little bit easier."

She has a nanny, but her husband helps out. "He's a great mother" she said, beaming.

So far, she has been treated with respect by her male colleagues. "All the way," she said.

She has experienced neither sexism nor harassment. "Knock on wood."

Some passengers are thrilled to learn that she is at the helm of the controls. As she put it, "They're very proud and happy to hear the voice of a woman."

Once, after landing the aircraft, a group of women surrounded Shecter to heap praise on her and tell her how glad they were that a woman had flown them back home.

She has no problems with jet lag. "I deal with it by resting." Nor is she intimidated by turbulence, especially when she is off duty. "It rocks me to sleep."

Shechter, who has two older sisters, neither of whom is a pilot, is currently waiting to enrol in a captain's course.

"I'm looking forward to taking and passing it, though it's not easy. I hope to be a captain in the coming year."

'Buycott' triumphs boycott of Israeli cosmetics

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — An initial attempt by local promoters of an economic boycott of Israel to discredit a line of Israeli cosmetics was effectively countered by supporters of Israel.

Tadamon (Arabic for solidarity), a group trying to get Quebecers not to buy Israeli goods, targeted the downtown Bay department store on Saturday, Oct. 31, because it sells Ahava beauty products.

Along with the Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights and the Quebec BDS (Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions) Committee, the group held a small demonstration across from the store in Phillips Square demanding that the Bay not stock the products.

The demonstrators' spokesperson Bill Sloan then entered the store and proceeded to give a speech in the cosmetics department denouncing the Ahava company for allegedly violating international law, before being hustled away by security guards. The scene can be viewed on YouTube.

The products did come off the shelves, but that was due to a co-ordinated effort led by Dawson College student Russell Sitrit-Leibovitch. The next day, Sunday, Nov. 1, about 100 people of all ages went to the Bay and bought every Ahava product that was for sale within about an hour, he said.

Sitrit-Leibovitch, president of Dawson Hillel, said the purchased products would be donated to a couple of women's shelters, one under Jewish auspices and the other not.

The anti-Israel demonstration was described as the Montreal launch of an international campaign to boycott Ahava, which makes products containing Dead Sea mud.

Sloan claimed that Ahava products are manufactured from "Palestinian natural resources stolen from the occupied West Bank" in an "illegal" Israeli settlement, Mitzpe Shalom.

"By selling Ahava products, the Bay is encouraging a company that benefits from the brutal Israeli system of apartheid and occupation in order to produce its goods. We are demanding that the Bay do the right thing and stop selling Ahava products."

A spokesperson for the Bay, at its corporate headquarters in Toronto, issued this statement to The CJN: "This brand is not unique to the Bay and is sold by many retailers and independents across Canada. The company has no plans at this time to discontinue the sale of this product."

The Ahava boycott campaign is being touted by Code Pink, a U.S.-based women's group opposed to the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq.

The Ahava counter-activity was endorsed by the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC). The CIC has launched the national Buycott Israel campaign, which aims to support Israel and combat anti-Israel boycotts by encouraging the purchase of products and services from Israel.

In Toronto last April, after anti-Israel activists urging a boycott of Israeli wines made known their intentions to picket a liquor outlet on the Sunday before Passover, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto asked the Jewish community to purchase as much Israeli wine as possible. Within half an hour of the call going out via e-mail, the targeted liquor store was sold out of Israeli wine.

One hundred and fifty cases were bought, and the handful of protesters was outnumbered by more than 1,000 pro-Israel advocates.

The CIC is urging supporters of Israel to buy Ahava products at the three other Montreal retailers that sell them and to thank the management for carrying them.

The campaign has a website at www.buycott.ca and a Facebook group.

The success of these two instances of community mobilization sends "the message that any time there is a call for a boycott of an Israeli product, the consequence will be exactly the opposite," said CIC executive vice-president Sara Saber-Freedman.

Fundraiser planned for Yavneh Yeshiva

Compiled by CJN Staff

The Canadian Alumni and Friends of Yeshivat Kerem B'Yavneh will host an after-dinner reception on Sunday, Nov. 15 at Congregation B'nai Torah.

"Many outstanding lay leaders throughout North America who share in our work in the Toronto area have graciously consented to serve as honorees at this special reception," said Rabbi Marc Volk, executive director of the American Friends of Yeshivat Kerem B'Yavneh.

The honorees for the evening are rabbinical alumnus awardees Rabbi Shlomo and Ofra Gemara, alumnus community awardees Ronnie and Shana Strauss, and young alumnus awardees Daniel and Elana Magder.

The featured speaker will be Rabbi Mordechai Greenberg, rosh hayeshiva of Yeshivat Kerem B'Yavneh. His topic will be "Chanoch L'naar Al Pi Darco: Educational Principles Based on the Patriarchs."

Rabbi Greenberg, came to Yeshivat Kerem B'Yavneh in 1960. He was recognized as one of the yeshiva's outstanding students, and became a close student of the founding rosh hayeshiva, Rabbi Chaim Yaakov Goldvicht. As a Hesder student, Rabbi Greenberg served in the tank corps of the Israel Defence Forces and fought in the Six Day War. He also attended weekly lectures at Yeshivat Mercaz Harav by Rabbi Zvi Yehuda Hakohen Kook and became very close with him as well.

Upon completion of the KBY Kollel program, Rabbi Greenberg was appointed a senior rabbi in the yeshiva and taught Israeli and overseas students. He became rosh hayeshiva in 1994.

Rabbi Greenberg is well known for his erudition in the field of Jewish law and his command of Jewish thought, particularly the teachings of Rabbi Kook and the explanation of the Vilna Gaon's commentary to the Code of the Jewish Law.

Under Rabbi Greenberg's leadership, the yeshiva's Israeli and overseas student body has grown to more than 400 students with an influx from South Africa and Australia, England and other European countries.

Yeshivat Kerem B'Yavneh imbues its students with a love of Torah, the Jewish People and the Land of Israel. It conceived the Hesder program, in which its Israeli students fulfil their dual obligation of Torah study and defending Israel. The yeshiva has also attracted many students from Toronto, Hamilton, Ottawa and Montreal over the years.

Israeli students lead Gray Academy's memorial for Yitzhak Rabin

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Winnipeg gave a warm welcome to six Israeli high school students and their teacher in late October.

They visited for 10 days as part of the Partnership 2000/ Kesher Chai (Living Bridge) initiative.

"This is a nice, warm community," said Revital Meiri, Danciger High School's mass communications teacher. "We were made to feel at home here."

The Danciger students visited the city as part of an annual student and teacher exchange program, going back 10 years, between the northern Israeli high school and the Gray Academy of Jewish Education. The exchange program is part of Partnership 2000, an initiative that links seven Canadian Jewish communities – not including Montreal and Toronto – with communities in northern Israel.

David Greaves, Combined Jewish Appeal's assistant director, said the goal of the program is to increase capacity in northern Israel – through refurbishing or building community centres, for example – to help keep people, and especially youths, in the northern communities, rather than having them move to Tel Aviv or Haifa.

"Our focus is on youth and education, and youth at risk. We support summer camps and counselling programs, too."

The Danciger High School students – Dorin Gold, Shani Friedman, Yuval Malul, Shimon Moyal, Meidan Yacobi and Gavriel Zerach – and their teacher arrived in Winnipeg on Oct. 26. The group led workshops for Gray Academy students – with a special emphasis on the Grade 3 classes – as well as students in the Hebrew bilingual program at Brock Corydon School.

They also led the Gray Academy's annual memorial program for Yitzhak Rabin, the former prime minister of Israel who was assassinated 12 years ago. The memorial program took place on Oct. 29, in the Berney Theatre at the Asper Jewish Community Campus.

The program began with a video overview of Rabin's life. The visiting students did readings, and Dorin sang a song in tribute to the slain prime minister.

In off hours, the students toured the legislature with cabinet minister Christine Melnick as their guide and met Winnipeg Premier Greg Selinger. They also visited the Forks, a 56-acre waterfront development in downtown Winnipeg, and the Museum of Man and Nature. On Shabbat, two of the group's observant members went to the Herzlia Synagogue in south Winnipeg, while the others attended services at Congregation Etz Chayim in the north end.

The students stayed with local families. "Our students and the host family's children all knew each other before we came," Meiri said. "They have been communicating on Facebook."

The Gray Academy sends a delegation of its students and teachers to the school in Israel in the spring, at a time that coincides with Memorial Day in Israel.

Meiri said that two of the Danciger students, Meidan and Shani, both of whom are in Grade 12, will join a group going to Poland to visit sites associated with the Holocaust shortly after they return to Israel.

"I think our visit to Winnipeg will give them the strength they need for that visit," Meiri says. "That's because we experienced a lot of love here. It is rare for Israelis to find in the world the kind of welcome we received in Winnipeg."

Observant entrepreneur joins Montreal council

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The almost quarter-century tradition of an observant Jew sitting on Montreal city council has been preserved with the election of political newcomer Lionel Perez.

Perez is a kippah-wearing, dot-com entrepreneur of Sephardi origin who identifies with the "yeshiva" community living in the de Vimy Avenue area.

He was elected in the Darlington district of the Côte des Neiges-Notre-Dame-de-Grâce borough in the Nov. 1 election as a member of Mayor Gérald Tremblay's Union Montréal team, taking the seat held by Saulie Zajdel.

Zajdel, 54, who comes from the Lubavitch community, retired after 23 years on city council.

The 39-year-old Perez garnered 43 per cent of the vote, handily defeating his nearest rival, Kamalathevi Jegatheeswaran of Louise Harel's Vision Montréal.

The ethnically and economically diverse district, which stretches from de Vimy to Victoria Avenue at the west, and to Jean Talon Street at the north and Côte Ste. Catherine Road to the south, has a significant Jewish population.

Lionel Perez

Perez says that while it's clear he had strong support from the Jewish community, he carried the great majority of the district's 67 polls. The turnout was 32 per cent, below the city-wide figure of just under 40 per cent.

Perez, who is fluently bilingual and at home in both the Sephardi and Ashkenazi worlds, was born in Montreal to parents who immigrated from Morocco in 1968. He grew up in Côte des Neiges and attended Jewish People's and Peretz Schools and Herzliah High School (St. Laurent.)

He describes his family as having been "traditionally observant" but he moved to a more religious lifestyle as an adult.

After receiving a BA in political science at Concordia University, he went to Osgoode Hall Law School at Toronto's York University for his common-law degree and returned to the Université de Montréal for a second one in civil law.

He practised law with a technology law firm for some years before going into business for himself, co-founding the Internet company CorporationCentre.ca in 2001. It offers online services to small businesses and now employs about 12 people. He remains its president and CEO.

He married Felicia Mayoff in 1995 and has lived in the de Vimy area since then. They have four children, aged three to 12.

Perez has been involved in numerous Jewish community organizations, including the Communauté sépharade unifiée du Québec, Jewish Family Services (before it merged into Agence Ometz) and the Mada Community Centre, a soup kitchen and food bank under Chabad auspices. He is currently president of a small neighbourhood synagogue, Tiferet Israel, and is on the board of Yeshiva Gedola Merkaz Hatorah.

"I have never been directly involved with politics, but I have always been interested in the political process," he said.

"I was approached by Saulie, who I would call an acquaintance, not a friend. The party was looking for a successor, and I was one of a few people who were asked.

"I definitely had the support of the Jewish community, but if that was my sole support, it wouldn't have been enough to win. I did a lot of door to door [campaigning]."

The issues did not appear to split along ethnic lines, he said. "Most electors were concerned with local services. Road safety and how to reduce speed on residential streets stood out… The Jewish population's concerns were pretty much the same as everyone else's."

Côte des Neiges-NDG remains strongly Union Montréal, with four of its five districts choosing the party's candidates.

Life has changed for Hershko

Life has changed somewhat for Hershko since the Nobel Prize.

"The first year was really bad. My life got disrupted quite a lot. I received so many speaking invitations and requests for interviews that I didn't have as much time for my grandchildren."

Hershko, who lives on Mount Carmel in Haifa, has since been far more selective. "I turn down 60 per cent to 70 per cent of invitations and accept three to four invitations to scientific meetings a year."

Although he shies away from the limelight and is less than thrilled being a celebrity, he considers the Nobel Prize a signal honour and a source of pride, both to Israel and his family.

"But I don't want to be a professional Nobel Prize laureate."

Asked if he was concerned by the spectre of academic boycotts against Israel, Hershko replied, "They are contrary to the academic spirit."

In a reference to its nuclear program, Hershko said, "What concerns me is Iran. Israel's existence is still in danger, maybe more than in the past. We have to be able to defend ourselves. I'm definitely concerned about Iran."

When asked whether Israel should strike nuclear sites in Iran, he said he could not discuss such weighty matters in public.

Jewish history of Ottawa chronicled

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Jewish community of Ottawa dates back to approximately 1857, when Moses Bilsky is reported to have arrived in what was then known as Bytown.

He would surely have been surprised – and, no doubt pleased – to know that on a sunny October day in 2009, his descendant, Anna Bilsky, stood before a packed auditorium to introduce a book containing that historical fact.

As chair of the book committee of the Ottawa Jewish Historical Society, Bilsky co-ordinated a project that began with an idea from the late Albert Rivers, then was funded through the efforts of the late Lawrence Freedman, and finally was created by a team of writers, editors, publishers and supporters.

The book is dedicated to the memory of the two men whose ideas made it a reality.

The final product, A Common Thread: A History of the Jews of Ottawa, is a beautiful book containing 175 photographs. Its cover contains one of a quilt, by artist Fortunee Shugar, that pieces together photographs chronicling the community's history.

The idea for a quilt, the oldest form of record keeping, led to the book's title, "a common thread." The quilt itself will hang in the library of Ottawa's Soloway Jewish Community Centre.

The book is divided chronologically into four sections. Each had a different author, lending a different tone to the various eras. Many familiar names appear throughout, as a number of the founding families are still prominent in the community.

Book to be presented to every bar and bat mitzvah child in the city

For members of the Ottawa Jewish community – those still living here and those who live elsewhere, but whose hearts and memories remain – the book is like a special family album. For many, there are stories and photographs of family and friends that will bring back happy thoughts of times past.

The book was launched – after six years of starts and stops – at a gala afternoon event on Oct. 18 at Ben Franklin Place. The MC, local CBC radio announcer Laurence Wall – a former board member of the Ottawa Jewish Historical Society – introduced former Ottawa mayor Jim Watson, now Ontario's minister of municipal affairs and housing, and read greetings from present mayor Larry O'Brien, who couldn't attend.

In his remarks, the president of the historical society, John Holzman, outlined his group's various programs, including taping all eulogies of funerals at the Jewish Memorial Chapel; sponsoring lectures by community members about their families' contributions to the community; annual recognition of individuals who have made an outstanding contribution to the preservation of Ottawa Jewish history, and the awarding of an annual scholarship from the Jacob Freedman Charitable Trust through the University of Ottawa to a student who has completed significant work in the field of Jewish studies.

He also announced that a copy of A Common Thread will be presented to every bar and bat mitzvah child in Ottawa.

The book is available in soft or hard cover through the Ottawa Jewish Historical Society or General Store Publishing House. Call 1-800-465-6072, or visit www.gsph.com.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Alzheimer numbers rising: specialist

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The numbers associated with Alzheimer's disease are staggering, says Dr. Michel Silberfeld, a psychiatrist and founder of the competency clinic at Baycrest.

"The worldwide scope of the illness is [huge]. It will affect [more than] 35 million people in 2010, 10 per cent higher than previously estimated," said Silberfeld, speaking recently as part of a medical series presented by Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel.

Silberfeld, an adjunct assistant professor of psychiatry at the University of Toronto and a founding member of the university's Joint Centre for Bioethics, said the annual number of diagnosed cases in Canada is about 60,000, and by 2031 about 500,000 people will be affected.

"After age 65, the rates of dementia double every five years, and after age 100, 85 per cent [of people] experience dementia. [The disease] is becoming more of a problem, because people are living longer."

Dr. Michel Silberfeld

Alzheimer's is also a story about women, who make up 72 per cent of affected Canadians, he said. "From a survival point of view, that's because they live longer than men."

Half of those with dementia live in the community, and half live in institutions, he said. "About two-thirds in the community have not had their dementia diagnosed. There is a big problem out there. It looms large, yet many don't know the statistics."

Alzheimer's – the most common form of dementia – is a neurodegenerative disease characterized by progressive cognitive decline, he said. "Changes include loss of memory, and an [inability] to perform everyday tasks and retrieve words.

"It progresses over time, and it takes about eight to 10 years to progress through all the stages. Some patients live with it for more than 20 years. [Because of this] what leads to their mortality is the secondary affects.

"People with Alzheimer's die twice – first, by losing what they know about themselves, and later by the death of their body."

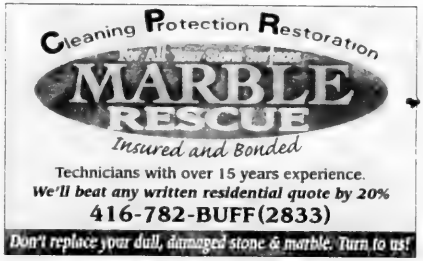
There have been attempts to treat Alzheimer's by using drugs to try to boost the level of neurotransmitters in the brain, he said, but half of all patients get no benefit from them. "There is some evidence that the drugs may delay institutionalization."

On a positive note, he said, some vaccines have been developed that may stop the process of the disease, and there will soon be a Canadian study on the effectiveness of these vaccines.

The burden of care for those who have Alzheimer's is also an important story, Silberfeld said, "and again, it is the story of women. "Seventy-five per cent of the caregivers are women. It is a considerable burden, and it is not well met, because it seems to fall on the wives and daughters."

Caregivers undergo radical changes in their lives, he said, "and they have a huge task. [They often] have no respite, and they are overwhelmed and tired.

"Then there are the psychological affects of dealing with a person who looks the same, yet no longer responds in the same, familiar way. It is crucial that caregivers receive support."



Convention emphasized environment and tikkun olam

Braverman's comments tied in with a biennial resolution encouraging Israel's efforts to address inequality among Israel's Jewish and Arab citizens.

It was the first time the Reform movement's major body passed a measure specifically addressing the needs of the minority population. The resolution notes that 50 per cent of Israeli Arabs live below the poverty line and receive only 71 per cent of the education resources due them.

Other resolutions called for supporting Jewish camping for children with special needs and affirming the Reform day school movement.

With respect to Israel's haredi population, Braverman noted that David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, "agreed that a couple of hundred ultra-Orthodox scholars would be subsidized, but he didn't expect such exponential growth."

Although the mood at the convention was upbeat, with the buzz of participants reconnecting and music from a total of some two dozen performers over the five days, URJ president Rabbi Eric Yoffie sounded a sobering note at the opening plenary when he talked about the recent economic crisis, "unprecedented since the Great Depression."

Much of the conference would be spent sharing related experiences and ideas, he said.

"It has been very difficult and painful, but we have made the changes needed to keep our synagogues strong," Rabbi Yoffie said.

As part of a recession-driven restructuring, the URJ – the congregational umbrella for the Reform movement with more than 900 affiliated synagogues in North America, including 26 in Canada – eliminated 60 full-time-equivalent positions in North America in January, and the Toronto office of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism was closed May 31. It was one of 14 regional URJ offices to be dismantled.

The "building blocks" of URJ – including summer camps, Israel programs, and North American Federation of Temple Youth – remain the same, Rabbi Yoffie said.

The biennial offered a varied program with an array of high-profile speakers including Tony Blair, former prime minister of the United Kingdom, and King Abdullah of Jordan, both of whom spoke via video feed; Dr. Ruth Westheimer, who discussed "Sex in the Jewish Tradition" at a Shabbat luncheon; Miriam Ziv and Michael Oren, Israel's ambassadors to Canada and the United States respectively; and Anita Diamant, author of The Red Tent.

Torah scholar Aviva Zornberg, philanthropist and Jewish camping advocate Harold Grinspoon, and human rights activist Irwin Cotler, MP, a former Justice Minister of Canada, also spoke at the conference, and received awards from the URJ.

As well, at the Women of Reform Judaism 47th assembly, which was held concurrently, Torontonian Judy Feld Carr received the Dr. Jane Evans Pursuit of Justice Award for having freed more than 3,000 Jews from Syria. Speakers, along with Feld Carr, included Izzeldin Abuelaish, the Palestinian doctor and peace proponent who lost three daughters and a niece when an Israeli tank shell shattered his Jabalia refugee camp home.

Topics at breakout learning sessions included Shabbat, "forgotten" congregants, intermarriage, young families, prayer, politics and temple budgets. There was an overall emphasis on environmental initiatives – which was also the subject of a resolution – and tikkun olam, particularly Nothing But Nets, the URJ's anti-malaria initiative to purchase bed nets for families in Africa.

Grade 8 students from Toronto's Leo Baeck Day School introduced a tzedakah project called Toonies for Togetherness to help fund a joint Jewish/Arab school that the Reform movement in Israel is running.

Like Ziv, who spoke before him, Braverman stressed the importance of countering Iran's nuclear threat.

During his presidential sermon, Rabbi Yoffie urged Reform Jews to consider the ethical, environmental and health aspects of what they eat, and come up with food policies for their synagogues.

He said that cutting down on red meat "is an area where we can make a difference" in offsetting our carbon footprint.

Diamant outlined her take on Judaism today – which she calls "Minhag America," borrowing the title of Rabbi Isaac Meyer Wise's 1856 siddur – and said that one of its cornerstones is the full participation of women. She was referring not only to women's participation on the bimah but also in public discourse, as evidenced by her speech.

A generation ago, "the idea that someone like me – a Reform Jew and a feminist – would found a mikvah [Boston's five-year-old Mayyim Hayyim], would cause heads to explode."

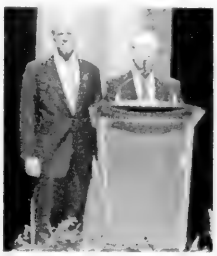
"Ancient roots are no more authentic than new growth," she said. "Both are crucial. Both are serious."

At Thursday morning's plenary – a joint session with the Women of Reform Judaism – Michael Oren, Israeli ambassador to the United States, said there are ways to allay doubts of those who condemn Israel, including "some of our own Jewish youth.

"We remind our listeners of the multiple times in history where Zionist and Israeli leaders accepted a two-state solution only to have those offers rejected," he said.

"We recognize the existence of a Palestinian people with relation to a state and a land that they regard as their homeland, but we are hard-pressed to find Palestinians who say the same thing about us."

As well, he added, "we recall the instances in which Israeli withdrawals were met with rockets."



Michael Oren and Rabbi Eric Yoffie

Drawing on his own experiences as a soldier, he said that Israel, by warning civilians of imminent attacks, was "sacrificing the element of surprise and risking the lives of our own soldiers."

Oren – who lost a sister-in-law in a suicide bombing and whose eldest son was wounded in battle – said Israel's actions equal "that of the world's most enlightened countries.

"We do have some shortcomings, but they should never impugn our right to exist as a free and secure nation."

Israel is facing a fundamental threat from "the unconventional weapon of deligitimization," Oren said. "It opens the door to economic sanctions, arrest of leaders for war crimes, and isolation as a pariah state.

Israel can and will defend itself, he stressed. "Jews of Israel, as Jews everywhere, have the right to defend themselves, the right to survive as Jews."

Former British prime minister Tony Blair, speaking live on a video feed from Yale University, said that in his experience, "religion matters. It motivates and galvanizes vast numbers of people in the world.

"How do we make it a force for good rather than conflict?" he asked.

He believes that will only happens "if part of our attitude as people of faith is an openness to those of a different faith."

In a question-and-answer session with Rabbi David Saperstein, director of the Washington, D.C.-based Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism, Blair said that real faith can give political leaders the strength to do what they think is right, and the humility to recognize that they may be wrong.

Blair said one of the things he likes about America is that "when people get up for the national anthem, it's a statement that there is a certain space in which we come together and the values we have in that space are not negotiable."

At the closing plenary, King Abdullah II of Jordan addressed the delegates by video, thanking them for giving him the opportunity to talk about multifaith dialogue.

"Every generation in history has faced the danger of interfaith division. In our time, we [have to] share the responsibility for peace," he said.

He called for a two-state solution that addresses the rights of Palestinians and Israelis. "We must act to put an end to the conflict in Israel. We must put [it] behind us so we can focus on what brings us together. We need to move forward to a genuine peace, and to live in harmony."

He praised the Union of Reform Judaism for promoting interfaith dialogue, and for reaching out to the Muslim community. "Together, we can make a difference," he said.

Battle over Jerusalem heats up

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

As part of an intensifying struggle over Jerusalem, Arab leaders are keeping up a relentless barrage of criticism of Jewish construction in the city and alleged violations of the status quo on the Temple Mount.

Last week, Egypt's President Hosni Mubarak and Jordan's King Abdullah issued a joint communique in Cairo accusing Israel of taking unilateral steps in Jerusalem that they said were undermining efforts to resume peace negotiations and could have catastrophic consequences for the entire region.

Some speakers last week at a conference on Jerusalem hosted by Morocco repeated the canard that Israel was tunnelling under the Al-Aksa Mosque on the Temple Mount compound, while others charged that the Israeli government has a master plan to isolate Arab eastern Jerusalem from the West Bank.

The allegations followed weeks of tension that erupted after a Jewish fringe group announced plans to visit and pray at the Temple Mount and a radical Israeli-Arab cleric charged that Al-Aksa was in danger and called upon Muslims to put their bodies on the line to defend it. The tensions sparked a series of clashes between stone-throwing Arab youths and Israeli police during the Jewish High Holidays.

Many of the Arab allegations are patently false. There is no tunnelling under Al-Aksa. On the mount itself, the Muslim religious trust known as the Wakf is in full control of the entire compound, and only Muslims are allowed to pray there. Jews and tourists are permitted to enter for three hours only in the morning and one hour in the afternoon – for individuals and small groups only – and Israeli police were quick to prevent the Jewish fringe group that wanted to pray on the mount from entering the compound.

But Jews are building homes in Arab neighbourhoods in eastern Jerusalem, and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has refused to halt their activities. There is tunnelling under the Arab neighbourhood of Silwan as archeologists search for remains of the biblical City of David, and Jewish construction in the Arab neighbourhoods of Sheik Jarrah and Ras al-Amud. National parks and archeological digs around the Old City's holy basin are supported and undertaken by right-wing Jewish organizations with a clear agenda: to make dividing the city impossible, leaving it all under Israeli jurisdiction and thereby rendering Muslim religious control of the Temple Mount politically irrelevant.

There are two parallel battles: one for the Temple Mount, which the Muslims are winning, and one for the city as a whole, where Israel has the upper hand.

On the mount, the Muslims have been expanding their religious space, and since 1996 have built two new mosques. At the same time, they deny any Jewish religious or national entitlement.

In late August, Sheik Taysir Tamimi, a leading Palestinian cleric, claimed that the Jewish temples never existed, that Jerusalem was never a Jewish city, that Al-Aksa was built by angels and that the Western Wall was a tying post for Muhammad's horse, al-Burak.

Israel retorts that Jewish claims about the temples having been located on the mount are universally accepted by scholars and that the historic and archeological evidence is incontrovertible.

Nevertheless, some Israeli experts claim that Israel already has lost the battle for the mount by surrendering religious control to the Muslims, failing to impose Israeli law on their building violations and abiding by a rabbinic ruling forbidding Jews from praying there precisely because of the awesome holiness of the place to Judaism. All this creates a lack of Jewish presence on the mount, which the Muslims have exploited to the full.

Shmuel Berkovits, a member of the Committee for Preventing the Destruction of Antiquities on Temple Mount, says the Muslims aim ultimately to turn the mount into something akin to the Kaaba in Mecca, an exclusively Muslim holy area from which non-Muslims are barred.

Israeli riot police encounter angry Palestinians in east Jerusalem who were told that the Jews were attempting to harm the Temple Mount. [Israel Sun photo]

Muslim control of the mount has not stopped agitators such as Sheik Raad Salah, head of the northern wing of the Israeli Arab Islamic movement, from trying to use trumped-up claims about a Jewish threat to Al-Aksa to mobilize the Arab world against Israel and thereby torpedo any emerging peace deal. Muslim control of the mount also has prompted Israeli right-wingers to build around the Old City in order to neutralize the Muslim advantage on the mount, drawing yet more fire from the Arab side.

The end result is an extremely volatile situation that Israeli security experts say could easily trigger a third Palestinian intifadah, or uprising.

The tensions over the city are unlikely to subside entirely until Israel and the Palestinians have a final peace treaty – likely to involve difficult concessions by both sides.

Authors of IDF ethics code urge Gaza war probe

By AMOS HAREL
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Two academics who authored the military's ethical code are calling on Israel to investigate some of the claims raised in the Goldstone report over its military offensive in the Gaza Strip last winter.

While the scholars level harsh criticism at the report, they believe there is no alternative to probing several specific conclusions contained in it.

Professors Moshe Halbertal and Avi Sagi are two of the authors of the Spirit of the IDF, a military code of conduct released in 1992.

Last week, Halbertal's article titled "The Goldstone Illusion," appeared in the U.S. magazine The New Republic, and Sagi posted an article on the website of Jerusalem's Shalom Hartman Institute. Both pieces called on Israel to examine some of the findings of the report, flawed though they believe it is.

Halbertal's article described the Goldstone report's objective as "to prepare a general indictment of Israel as a predatory state that is geared toward violating human rights all the time."

Nonetheless, Halbertal wrote that Israel should respond to the report and present the guidelines by which it waged Operation Cast Lead. Israel, he wrote, must conduct an investigation that would restore perceptions of the legitimacy of its right to self-defence.

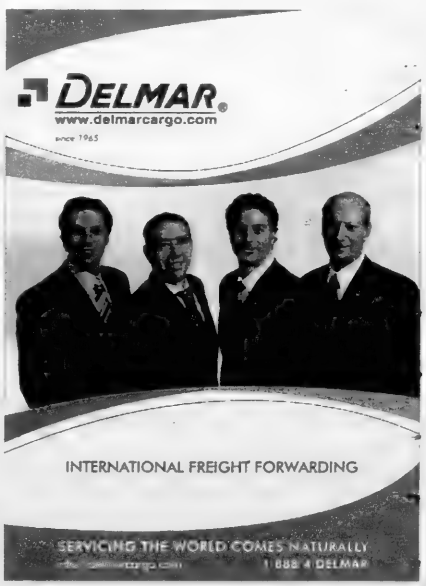
Among the report's claims that he believes merit an Israeli response are those of troops opening fire on a Palestinian mother and daughter carrying white flags, the destruction of homes in the conflict's final days, and harming civilian infrastructure such as power stations and water facilities.

In his article, Sagi wrote that the Spirit of the IDF sets a high bar for troops' conduct, requiring soldiers to do everything in their power to avoid harming unarmed individuals.

Sagi stated that even if Israel rejects the Goldstone report as a distortion of justice, "the question remains over whether in fact IDF troops operated everywhere as required, according to the values to which they are committed."

"I'm certain that no one instructed an IDF soldier to harm civilians," he wrote, adding: "In my heart, there is a deep suspicion that in some of the military operations, soldiers and commanders did not adopt the highest [ethical] standard, and did not do everything in their power to avoid harming unarmed individuals."

Sagi added that he is concerned that the primary investigation into the Gaza conflict is being conducted within the legal system. The law, he wrote, sets a minimal standard for behaviour, and everything below that standard is considered criminal. He wrote, however, that even some military behaviour sanctioned by law can lead to an ethical "slippery slope."



Israel raids ship allegedly carrying arms for Hezbollah

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The United States informed Israel about a ship carrying tons of weapons allegedly en route from Iran to the Hezbollah, but vetoed Israel's plans to attack, the international Arab daily Asharq Alawsat reported on Friday.

Israel raided the ship in the waters off the coast of Cyprus earlier last week and redirected it to the port of Ashdod, where it unloaded 500 tons of weapons.

In its report on Friday, Asharq Alawsat cited Israeli sources as saying that Israel had intended to attack the ship but had refrained at the insistence of the United States. No other source could confirm the report.

The ship, named the Francop, was stopped by a special naval force about 100 miles off the coast of Israel before dawn last Wednesday in an operation dubbed Operation Four Species.

Hezbollah said it has no connection to a large cache of arms found on the ship intercepted by Israel. "Hezbollah denies any link to the weapons that the Zionist enemy claims it removed from the vessel Francop," the group said in a statement. "At the same time, it condemns Israeli piracy in international waters."

The German-owned ship operated by a Cypriot company was en route from Iran to Syria with a planned stop in Beirut, according to Israel's Foreign Ministry. It carried arms including Katyusha rockets, assault rifles, grenades and mortar shells, as well as an advanced anti-aircraft platform, Israel Radio reported.

The Francop left Ashdod on Thursday after the ship was unloaded. Thirty-two trucks were required to transfer the weapons seized from the ship to a warehouse in central Israel. The military determined that the crew did not know about the arms, hidden underneath regular cargo.

Israel's Foreign Ministry on Thursday invited diplomats from around the world to the port to view the weapons.

"The seizure of the ship was carried out as part of the navy's ongoing intensive fight against terrorism and the prevention of weapons smuggling," an IDF statement said.

Syria and Iran have also denied Israel's accusations, Reuters reported.

The arms shipment began its journey about two weeks ago aboard an Iranian ship that sailed from the port of Bandar Abbas to the Mediterranean port of Damietta (Dumyat) in Egypt.

The cargo – which, according to a ship manifest, was destined for Syria – was unloaded in Egypt, and then loaded three days later onto the Francop.

The navy, which tracks suspicious activity at sea along known smuggling routes in the Mediterranean and the Red Sea, located the Francop shortly after it left Damietta on Tuesday on its way to Limassol, Cyprus, and from there, to Syria. Toward evening, an Israeli navy missile boat made contact with the Francop and asked to conduct a routine inspection of its cargo. Israeli naval commandos boarded at around midnight on Tuesday, in rough seas, and met with no resistance from the ship's crew of 11.

The Israeli naval personnel checked the ship's manifest, which showed that the cargo was going to the Syrian port of Latakia, and began opening the containers.

They found sacks of polyethylene near the opening and along the walls of the containers, but behind the sacks, they discovered numerous crates of ammunition and artillery shells. At that point, they ordered the crew to sail to Ashdod.

The cargo included thousands of medium-range 107- and 122-millimetre rockets, armour-piercing artillery, hand grenades and ammunition for Kalashnikov rifles. Even before all the cargo was unloaded, the navy estimated that the haul included more than 3,000 rockets and a total of 300 tons of weaponry. This compares to only 40 tons seized in 2002 on the Karine A, whose weapons were destined for the Palestinians.

The rockets and artillery shells on the Francop were mostly manufactured over the past two years, and though they had English-language markings, intelligence officials believe that most were manufactured in Iran, although the 122-millimetre rockets were apparently manufactured in Russia.

Because of way the crates were hidden, the army is convinced that the weapons were destined for Hezbollah in Lebanon. Such a shipment would be a clear violation of UN Resolution 1701, which ended the Second Lebanon War in 2006.

The cargo did not include rocket launchers or advanced weaponry that would alter the balance of power with Israel, but the army said the rockets that were seized are the equivalent of about 10 per cent of Hezbollah's existing stock, and could have been used for weeks of intensive shelling of northern Israel.

In Tehran, Syrian Foreign Minister Walid al-Moallem dismissed Israeli allegations that the ship carried arms.

"Unfortunately, some pirates sometimes take action in the name of inspection and prevent the sailing of commercial ships," he was quoted as saying by the state IRNA news agency during a visit Wednesday. "This ship was carrying goods from Syria heading to Iran and was not carrying weapons-making materials."

It was unclear why Moallem said the ship was headed in the opposite direction of that claimed by Israel. Syrian officials were not immediately available for comment in Damascus.

UN 'detached from reality', Israel says

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel has rejected a United Nations General Assembly resolution urging an investigation into a report that says war crimes were committed in Gaza during last winter's war there, and it condemned the world body vote as "completely detached from realities."

In a statement last week, the Israeli Foreign Ministry said in response to the Nov. 5 vote that Israel "maintains the right to self defence," and would "continue to act to protect the lives of its citizens from the threat of international terrorism."

The resolution, endorsing a report on the Gaza war commissioned by the Geneva-based UN Human Rights Council, was non-binding and seen as unlikely to force either Israel or Islamist Hamas rulers in Gaza to investigate the findings.

The report on the Gaza war was drafted by a UN panel chaired by retired South African judge Richard Goldstone, which concluded that both Israel and Palestinian fighters committed war crimes and possible crimes against humanity.

The 192-member General Assembly adopted the resolution by a vote of 114-18, with others absent or abstaining. The resolution calls on the Security Council to act if either side fails to launch credible investigations within three months.

Canada, along with 17 other countries – including the United States, Italy, the Netherlands, Poland, Israel and the Czech Republic – voted against the resolution. But the European Union was split, with others including Britain and France abstaining. Most developing countries voted in favour.

A total of 44 countries abstained.

Speaking about Canada's decision to vote against the measure, a spokesperson for Prime Minister Stephen Harper told The CJN that "Canada proudly did not support the Goldstone report going to the UN General Assembly. Canada does not have a vote at the United Nations Human Rights Council, but did not support the report going to the United Nations General Assembly."

The spokesperson added: "Canada was concerned about the unbalanced nature of the mandate of the UN fact-finding mission on the Gaza conflict when it was first considered, in that it did not clearly call for investigation of both sides and did not recognize that rocket fire on Israel led to the crisis. In commissioning this study, the Human Rights Council pre-emptively assumed Israel's culpability."

Moshe Ronen, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, said his organization was "deeply appreciative of [Canada's] principled stand" at the UN. He said Canada's position "highlights the fatally flawed premise of an inquiry that effectively prejudged Israel and attributed culpability even before it began its investigation."

Many other Jewish community organizations across North America also issued statements decrying the General Assembly's adoption of the Goldstone report.

Frank Dimant, executive vice president of B'nai Brith Canada, "applauded" Canada's position while blasting the UN for passing the resolution.

"The fact that a democracy fighting to protect its citizens from terrorism is continuing to be judged by the same standards as a terrorist group purposefully trying to maximize Israeli civilian casualties is an absurdity," he said.

Israel has responded with outrage to the findings issued in September by the Goldstone panel, seeing the document as an Arab bid to undermine the reputations of its military and political leaders.

"Israel rejects the resolution of the UN General Assembly, which is completely detached from realities on the ground that Israel must face," the Foreign Ministry statement said.

The harshly worded UN draft resolution, composed by Arab member states, wasn't softened, despite U.S. and European efforts.

Israel's ambassador to the UN, Gabriela Shalev, told Ha'aretz before the vote that she didn't plan to take part. "I won't lend a hand to a debate whose conclusions are predetermined. It was a predictable Arab game."

The resolution enjoyed wide support among the Non-Aligned Movement bloc and the Arab bloc, which together comprise an automatic majority of 120 votes.

The draft resolution includes a demand for the Israeli government to carry out an "independent and credible" internal investigation of its own conduct during Israel's three-week offensive in Gaza.

Hamas isn't mentioned by name in the UN draft resolution. Instead, it calls on the "Palestinian side" to carry out an investigation into the Goldstone report findings that relate to Palestinians.

There is no veto in UN General Assembly votes, but the assembly's resolutions are non-binding. However, resolutions adopted by the General Assembly grant legitimacy to Security Council initiatives. But the five permanent members of the Security Council have the power to veto any resolution put up for a vote. Thus, any Arab initiative for an extreme resolution against Israel, such as the submission of the Goldstone report to the International Criminal Court, will likely be vetoed by the United States.

If the matter is put up for a Security Council vote, there is also the possibility that the United States and its allies – Britain or France – will block an official resolution, and instead issue a presidential statement or a press release.

Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general to Toronto and Western Canada, also praised Ottawa for its vote last week. "As far as Israel is concerned, Canada has again proved its moral commitment to fighting terrorism and recognizing who wants to achieve peace and stability, and who wants to create havoc and conflict," Gissin said. "The Israeli government and the Israeli people appreciate this principled stand."

Man charged in family's murder

The man arrested for the murder of three generations of an Israeli family had been fired from the family's restaurant more than a year ago. Damian Kirilik, 38, was arrested last week for the Oct. 17 murder of six members of the Oshrenko family. Kirilik was fired as head waiter of the family's restaurant in Rishon Lezion. The victims were Revital, 3, and Netanel, 4 months; their parents, Tatiana, 28, and Dimitry, 32; and grandparents Edward and Ludmilla, both 56. Tatiana and Dimitry were Russian emigres who operated clubs and a restaurant for Russian Israelis. Their bodies, all bearing stab wounds, were found in their burning apartment. Robbery and avenging honour appear to be the motives behind the killing. Kirilik's wife, who also had worked at the restaurant, was arrested for aiding the alleged murderer.

Israel helps Hajj pilgrims

Israel delivered 20,000 swine flu vaccines to the Palestinian Authority ahead of the annual Muslim pilgrimage to Mecca. The Civil Administration in the West Bank, a unit in the Israeli Ministry of Defence, arranged for the entry of 20,000 doses of swine flu vaccine into Ramallah. This year, Saudi Arabian authorities have made swine flu vaccination a condition for entrance into Mecca, Islam's holiest city. Islam commands that Muslims complete the Hajj, an annual pilgrimage to the city, at least once during their lifetimes. It's the largest annual pilgrimage in the world. According to the Civil Administration statement, Israel "places great value on co-operation and co-ordination with the Palestinian Authority in the fields of health and religious expression."

Iran warhead design tested?

The International Atomic Energy Agency has evidence that Iran may have tested an advanced nuclear warhead design, according to a British newspaper. The Guardian reported that "previously unpublished documentation" from a dossier compiled by the UN's nuclear watchdog group states that Iranian scientists may have tested high-explosive components of a two-point implosion device, and the IAEA has asked Iran to explain the finding. The existence of such technology is officially secret in both the United States and Britain. The device would enable the production of smaller and simpler warheads, making it easier to attach them to a missile. The IAEA was not available for comment. The group said in September that it has no proof Iran has or once had a secret nuclear program.

Flag wearing nixed

Israeli students visiting Poland have been asked to stop wrapping themselves in the Israeli flag. Two longtime leaders of youth delegations to Poland said in a pamphlet that wearing the flag is disrespectful and against the 1949 Flag and Symbol Law, Ha'aretz reported. They also are trying to draw a distinction between the serious visit and "stadium culture," according to the newspaper. "The students' use of the flag is more reminiscent of behaviour in football stadiums than memorial services," said Gideon Goldstein. About 25,000 students participate each year in delegations to Poland organized either by the Education Ministry or by the schools. The flag "helps students cope with the intense feelings aroused during the visit," a teacher told Ha'aretz. Another teacher said the students' use of the flag demonstrates "defiance against the Poles and a sort of revenge. It is entirely unnecessary."

EU, Israel ink farm pact

The European Union and Israel signed a new agricultural agreement in Brussels. The agreement updates the original agricultural agreement signed in the 1970s. It's the result of lengthy negotiations led by Israel's Ministry of Agriculture and the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labour. Since the original signing, the agreement has been updated several times in order to reflect the significant changes in the needs of both parties. Access to the markets of both sides has been greatly improved under the new agreement. In the processed agricultural products sector, more than 95 per cent of the products will be exempt from all taxes or levies. Considerable liberalization was undertaken in all areas of fresh produce and approximately 80 per cent will be exempt from all customs restrictions.

Haifa U calls on Norwegian U to remove boycott proposal

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Prof. Yossi Ben-Artzi is a specialist in historical geography and the conservation of historical sites, so it's no surprise he picked a European geographical metaphor to make his point.

Like the legendary Little Dutch Boy who put his finger in a dyke to stop a leak, he, too, has decided not to wait for events to escalate before taking action. In his case, Ben-Artzi, rector of the University of Haifa, has written to his counterpart at the Norwegian University of Science and Technology (NTNU) in Trondheim asking that a proposed academic boycott of Israel be removed from the agenda of the board of governors, which is slated to meet on Thursday.

"Academic boycott serves only to harm academic freedom, impede intellectual advancement and offend universal values," Ben-Artzi stated in a news release. Expanding on his position in a telephone interview, Ben-Artzi said he deemed it necessary to call on NTNU rector Torbjorn Digernes "because it's the first case in Europe outside Britain. (Britain's University and College Union considered a boycott of Israeli educational institutions but eventually backed away from the proposal when it was determined it was illegal.)

"Now, this is a new trial by those who are against academic freedom in Israel and [who want] to put pressure on Israel through academic institutions in Europe. This is very dangerous to Israel that even one institution will decide to take this measure of a boycott," Ben-Artzi stated.

The university administrator suggested activists behind the attempted British boycott were seeking another jurisdiction in which to continue the effort. "It looks like an operation to find the first one [university] to do it. From outside, it looks like a very co-ordinated operation between some of the persons at the university," he said.

According to the Jerusalem Post, the boycott initiative started with a letter signed by 34 professors and assistant professors at NTNU and the University College of Sør-Trøndelag, both in Trondheim. The letter called for "international pressure against Israel so that real negotiations between Israel, democratically elected Palestinian authorities and the international society can begin."

It goes on to claim Israeli institutions of higher learning "have played a key role in [Israel's] policy of oppression" and that "Israel goes against all the ideals of open universities and academic freedom."

Not all academics at NTNU support that position. Prof. Bjørn Alsberg has drafted a petition that includes the signatures of 25 NTNU professors, five Nobel laureates and more than 1,000 academics and concerned citizens from around the world opposing the boycott, the Post reported.

In New York, meanwhile, the Anti-Defamation League "urged the European Union to disqualify any university that adopts an anti-Israel academic boycott from participating in the EU's student exchange program, Erasmus."

While Norway is not a member of the European Union, the Trondheim institution benefits from its participation in Erasmus. ADL national director Abe Foxman said "academic boycotts are clearly antithetical to the spirit and purpose of the Erasmus program to enhance academic cooperation."

Ben-Artzi believes proponents of the boycott want "to isolate Israel as much as they can and bring Israel to the status of South Africa," by labelling it an apartheid state.

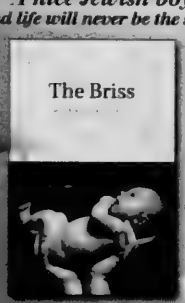
Ben-Artzi said Israel's academic world is "based on universal values like freedom of expression and the free exchange of ideas. A boycott is actually the opposite to the ideal of academic life."

Adding to the absurdity of the campaign, the Israeli academy is "a stronghold of democracy and criticism of the government," he added.

Ben-Artzi called on "the Jewish world and Israel to do everything to put the finger in the wall, while we can still fight it.

"Persecuting the State of Israel will not advance the peace process," he added.

A nice Jewish boy falls for a nice Palestinian girl – and life will never be the same for the Ostrove family back in Winnipeg.



"Addictive storytelling... aggressively funny and stealthily horrific... Tregebov's Jewish Winnipeg raises echoes of Richler's Montreal."

"Outrageously funny, even as it confronts hard questions of Palestinian, Arab, Israeli and Jewish identity."

Canadian-Israeli filmmaker wins a Gemini

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Canadian-Israeli filmmaker Daniel Oron said that it wasn't until he won his first Gemini Award last month that he began to understand why award winners always say they never expected to win.

"I now believe everyone who gets up there and says I never believed this was going to happen," said Oron, a 37-year-old director, writer and producer who won a Gemini for best direction in a reality series. Oron was recognized for his work on Reality Obsessed, a show that airs on TVtropolis and is produced by a Toronto-based independent television company called Peace Point Entertainment group.

"Nobody ever actually feels like [they're going to win]. There were so many amazing people in that room, it was just amazing to be amongst them."

Oron is a Israeli native who moved back and forth between the United States and Israel before he settled in Toronto 10 years ago. He has been working with Peace Point since it was founded seven years ago.

Oron said that winning the Gemini felt like a great achievement.

"When you're a kid that has a dream that one day you're actually going to stand amongst the others to receive an award... to be acknowledged as a best director in my field was extremely touching.

"It really meant a lot to me as a multi-national character, someone who came to this country, who wasn't born or raised here, but still managed to rise in the industry."

He won a Broadcast Design Award in 2002 for his work on the Juno Awards, and his short films have been recognized at festivals around the world.

Oron received critical acclaim for his first short film, Roy, which has been sold to dozens of television networks over the years.

"That was kind of my homage to Tim Burton. It's a crazy story about a guy who is arguing with himself. The body and the head are having an argument in an apartment on a cold winter's night in a crazy landlady's spooky apartment building."

Sweet Sixteen, his second film, is about a young girl who discovers that she is a clone of another girl who died, and his most recent film, Look Both Ways, explores the dangers of kids becoming obsessed with video games.

But the television show for which he was awarded a Gemini is a departure from his short film work.

Reality Obsessed is a series hosted by Toronto native Murtz Jaffer, 28, who is considered the world's foremost reality TV expert.

"There is no one on the planet more connected to the world of reality television than he is. He has autographs and pictures with everyone from Martha Stewart to Donald Trump, to the last winner of Survivor – you name it," Oron said.

"The show takes him and sort of examines the mechanisms of reality TV by putting him through a number of adventures that expose him both to the stars that he loves and watches, and also to the kind of scenarios that we all [see] when watching reality TV."

He said that Reality Obsessed, for which he is slated to film its third season, is just one of the many projects he is proud to work on, including Survive This, a show about kids surviving in the wilderness, and Animals at Work, which led him to spend a month in Africa filming a show about "animals with cool jobs." Oron is in Chicago this month shooting a pilot for MTV.

Daniel Oron. [Photo by Danica Hansen]

Oron said that his interest in film and television was triggered when he was a young boy.

"I've been pretty much shooting little films and doing special effects since I was maybe eight. When I got a little older, I took special effects courses and I got into practical effects, pyrotechnics, special makeup effects – pretty much anything involved in sci-fi and fantasy," he said.

"I grew up on Star Wars and Indiana Jones and E.T., so my first dream was to become a special effects artist, but I think in reality what I was dreaming of was making movies and being involved on that level and creating stories that were fantastic or exciting."

He said that although his father worked in the field of medical research and his mother was a professional journalist, they were both very artistic and encouraged him to be creative.

"My mother is very into writing and culture and aboriginal cultures around the planet, and weaving and tapestries, and my dad is from a line of painters and sculptors... So I wasn't encouraged to grow up to be a doctor or grow up to be a lawyer. They let me be whatever I wanted to be."

After finishing his tour as an officer in the Israeli Defence Forces, he enrolled in Tel Aviv University's film program.

"I didn't really know that I wanted to be a director probably until film school, when I began shooting my own stuff."

He said on one level, there is no difference between directing short films and directing television "because you are always struggling to tell the best story you can with the tools you have."

But he added, when you film reality or documentary-type television, you have a concept of what you want to do, but you have to understand that "you don't really know the outcome."

He said that his is interested in working on a feature film and is currently developing a project titled Whiskey 4-2.

"That's the name of a call sign for a Canadian squad on a mission in Afghanistan. It's kind of like Black Hawk Down meets The Breakfast Club. It's a little story against the backdrop of a huge war, and it kind of examines what it's like to be a Canadian soldier in Afghanistan."

He said he also wants to pursue projects that tap into his Israeli and Jewish background.

"I come from a family that was very involved in the Ethiopian Jewish absorption and rescue [by Israel in 1984 and 1991] and I have Ethiopian family due to that. Some of their stories are remarkable, and I have them recorded," Oron said.

"I feel like it's not just my duty, but my passion to bring some of those stories to the foreground of filmmaking."

A COMIC TRAGEDY FROM ISRAEL ABOUT A SUICIDE BOMBING
About the Oranges
Written and performed by Robbie Gringras
Wednesday, November 18, 8 PM (doors 7 PM)
Six Degrees, 2335 Yonge St (at Eglinton)
Robbie Gringras immigrated from Britain to Israel 12 years ago and has performed About the Oranges around the world to critical acclaim. This edgy, emotional one-man play follows a man who arrives late for a job interview. 35 days late. Why? Well, it all begins with Mohammed. Not the prophet, the baker. Why does a baker become a bomber? What leads a man to defend a terrorist? How can a traumatised lover of Israel keep on loving?
"Gringras has stripped down the Middle East conflict to its essentials: pain and comedy." – The Guardian
"a one-man theatrical border conflict, with Gringras madly stomping across national, political and generational lines – not to mention the jagged one that divides laughter and pain." – The Vancouver Sun

Actor/singer's new CD to be released worldwide

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

When 18-year-old Tajja Isen isn't jet-setting across the Atlantic to record her first solo album with two of Britain's hottest producers, she continues to be sought out to voice many a character in the animation world. She is also studying English at the University of Toronto on a scholarship. And if that doesn't keep her busy enough, last month Isen picked up a Gemini Award for her voiceover work as Atomic Betty, in the hit series of the same name.

Tajja Isen

Isen and the cast of Atomic Betty won a Gemini Award in the category of best individual or ensemble performance in an animated program or series. "I got to keep the award," says Isen. "Since I know the Canadian animation community so well, everyone was so supportive and so excited with me and for me for this.

"It was a very honouring, humbling experience. It was the first time I went to the Geminis, the first nomination and the first win. It was a nice kind of initiation to that."

The singer-songwriter, pianist and actor began her life in showbiz at the age of 10, and her voiceover career continues to flourish.

Although Atomic Betty is no longer in production, she's working on two preschool animated series for next year. One, as yet untitled, is for CBC Television and the other, from Breakthrough Film & Television, is called My Big, Big Friend, in which she co-stars with her younger sister, and fellow voiceover actor, Nissae, 12.

But Isen's primary focus right now is her music, which she describes as alternative with an accessible element to it. She says it is piano-centred with a jazzy element to it, similar to the music of American chanteuses Fiona Apple and Rachael Yamagata.

Yamaha Canada recognized her musical talents by sponsoring her for an Artist Development Relationship; this includes supplying her with grand pianos for her performances and studio recordings.

Isen's father, Jordie, a chiropractor with a layperson's understanding of the music business, decided, because of its vibrancy, the United Kingdom music scene was the happening place for his daughter to nurture her musical talents.

Isen attracted the attention of the top, London-based producer Jon Kelly. "I was really interested in working with Jon Kelly because of the people he had worked with," Isen says. "He worked with Tori Amos and he produced four of Kate Bush's albums, and they are two of my influences."

Kelly brought Paul (Wix) Wickens on board, musical director and keyboard player for Paul McCartney.

Isen, along with several first-class British studio musicians, began laying down tracks last January. Sixteen tracks, all composed by Isen, have been recorded to date, and there are plans to go back to London in December to record more. The title and projected launch date aren't determined yet, but plans are to release the CD in the U.K. first, and then worldwide.

Once her CD is released, Isen looks forward to touring in support of the album. "A big part of what I'm looking forward to is getting out there and spreading my music by playing shows," she says.

In her precious spare time, Isen loves to write songs and read. She says she has an appetite for books that continues to grow. Isen also enjoys spending time at the family's Thornhill, Ont., home with her father, mother Karen and her four younger siblings.

Brighton Beach Memoirs opens Teatron's seventh season

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Timing is everything for the artistic director of Teatron Toronto Jewish Theatre, opening its 2009-10 season with Neil Simon's Brighton Beach Memoirs at the Toronto Centre for the Arts.

"I always wanted to produce Brighton Beach Memoirs, but I had other plays to do first," Ari Weisberg said. "We are a Jewish theatre and our plays have a strong Jewish theme, dilemma or historical venture, so there were other plays waiting in the queue that had to be done first."

The Teatron is a not-for-profit company that Weisberg founded in 2002. It previously produced plays such as The Dybbuk, A Glimpse of the Light and Conversations With My Father, all directed by Weisberg.

"Brighton Beach Memoirs chronicles a Jewish family in Brighton Beach, but the Jewish dilemma is not up front as a whole," said Weisberg. "It's more about a family relationship between the characters and it's a bit more universal, so it had to be the right time in Teatron's development to present that particular play."

Brighton Beach Memoirs is the story of Eugene Jerome, a 15-year-old boy, who fantasizes about becoming a baseball star, while observing in a witty way the challenges his family meets when they open up their home to his aunt and teenage cousins during Depression-era New York City's Brighton Beach.

Weisberg has always been a fan of Neil Simon, whose messages reach audiences through warmth and humour, yet often deal with serious issues. In Brighton Beach Memoirs, Simon explores economic hardship, a death in the family, and the challenges that arise when a relative arrives from Europe and when four teenage cousins share a bedroom.

"Simon's excellent writing brings all this within the framework of the play through humour. One of the ways Jews cope during difficult times is through humour, so even though the Jerome family meets challenges, the humour comes across – that's one thing that attracted me to the show for years," said Weisberg.

Returning to Teatron Toronto Jewish Theatre are actors Arnie Zweig as Jack, Jordan Cohen as Stanley and Vanessa Graymason as Nora. A newcomer to Teatron is Gananoque, Ont.'s B.J. Jeroy, who plays the lead role of Eugene.

To keep action flowing from one scene to the next, set designer Ed Rosin created a realistic set incorporating the bedrooms, living room and dining room, as well as the front yard in a storey and a half set.

"I really like Ed's approach as it's more of a side-split," Weisberg says. "There are different levels, but it doesn't break up the action like a two-storey set does with eight feet above. Ed's design allows characters in different parts of the house to seem like their lines are interwoven, creating a beautiful united flow."

Weisberg is collaborating with award-winning art photographer Orah Buck in a photograph and video exhibit for the theatre's lobby, which explores the real-life Brighton Beach neighbourhood then and now, where waves of immigrants made their homes over the years.

"I've seen Orah's show before, so when she approached us and offered to do this collaboration, I jumped on it right away. Her photos are fantastic. The exhibit gives people some idea of what Brighton Beach was and is. It's a tremendous opportunity that playgoers can enjoy before the play and during the intermission," said Weisberg.

This year, Teatron Toronto Jewish Theatre has moved to the Studio Theatre at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, while its old home, the Leah Posluns Theatre, undergoes renovation.

Brighton Beach Memoirs is running Nov. 11 to 22. For tickets, call 416-781-5527 or www.teatrontheatre.com.

Out of Town: The London, Ont., Jewish Film Festival marks its 11th season by screening the award-winning Israeli films Brothers, Zrubavel and A Matter of Size, at Wolf Performance Hall and Rainbow Cinemas, Nov. 21 and 22. Igaal Niddam, director of Brothers, is a special guest of the festival, which also includes art exhibitions.

The all-Israel program "is a response to the protests directed against the Toronto International Film Festival's decision to feature Tel Aviv filmmakers in its program earlier this summer," said festival chair Thelma Rosner. "That great festival became politicized in a way that it had never been before. In fact, Israeli films are winning awards all over the world and are deserving of praise."

Tickets are available at various locations, including the Rainbow Cinemas, the London Jewish Community Centre and Temple Israel of London.

Concert pays tribute to Srul Irving Glick

By JORDANA DIVON
Special to The CJN

A few bars into her first song, Ramona Carmelly suddenly stopped singing. The gifted mezzo-soprano clutched her chest, tears threatening to overwhelm her, as she apologized to the audience. "I'm sorry, I just need a moment," she told the full house.

After several deep breaths, Carmelly gathered herself, closed her eyes and started her piece again, a soaring, gorgeous interpretation of Jewish-Canadian composer Srul Irving Glick's Time Cycle, a jewel from his much-admired Yiddish Suite No. 2.

Ramona Carmelly

While the reaction displayed by Carmelly – a childhood friend of Glick's daughter –was perhaps the most visibly emotional of the night, it certainly was not an isolated one.

Of the dozen musicians who took the stage at the Al Green Theatre on Oct. 29 to pay tribute to Glick on what would have been his 75th birthday year, most had a deep personal relationship with the composer.

And it was that connection to Glick not just as a musical presence, but also as a father, colleague and dearly loved friend that lent the evening its profound note of intimacy, remembrance and joy.

Glick, considered one of Canada's most prominent composers, died of cancer in 2002, at age 67. During his prolific career, he worked as a classical music producer for CBC, and served as choir director and composer-in-residence at the Beth Tikvah Synagogue, for which he composed most of his liturgical music.

Although Glick's liturgical works remained deeply rooted in the Jewish tradition, he was masterful at incorporating moments of playfulness and sudden bursts of energy that would jar listeners back into the present, in the event they had been lulled by a languid piano line.

In no other performer was that playfulness more present than in violinist Jacques Israelievitch. But before he reached for his violin and bow, the French-born master honoured the man who possessed a "fantastic ear," and whose generous, kind spirit put Israelievitch at great ease during demanding recording sessions.

"He knew just how to give you constructive feedback, even a little inspiration that made you feel better rather than feeling threatened or disappointed in yourself," Israelievitch told the crowd, before launching into Glick's Suite Hebraique No. 6 for violin and piano.

Cutting a striking figure in his cherry-red button-down shirt, the French-born musician balanced the suite's mix of melancholic klezmer-inspired themes with the bold inventiveness of contemporary western music, the contrast of which served as a hallmark of Glick's sound.

Susan Hoeppner
[Taffi Rosen photo]

Equally prodigious was world-class flautist Susan Hoeppner, whose version of the composer's Sonata for flute and piano Glick himself considered among the most sensitive and energetic interpretations he had heard.

Interest in Glick's Sonata has recently been revived online, where a number of blogs have discussed their admiration for the piece and where to find Hoeppner's recordings of it.

"I felt immediately connected to Srul after listening to [the sonata]," Hoeppner said. "It's one of the most special pieces in my repertoire, and it's literally become part of my soul."

Hoeppner wasn't exaggerating. Her connection to the piece was palpable, and it was the delight produced by her emotion, artistry and technique that elicited cries of "Brava!" and a standing ovation.

Closing the tribute, the Elmer Iseler Singers selected The Time Is Now, one of Glick's final compositions. The lyrical content reflects what Lydia Adams, Iseler conductor and Glick's close friend, recalls as the composer's ability to be present in the moment, and to live and love to his fullest capacity.

"I was actually wrestling with how to end the piece tonight, thinking about how he would want it," she said. "And at one point, I just saw him dancing in my mind in joy, and I thought, that's it! That's the way it should be. It's joyful. And life was really a joy with him. He was a light."

Daniel Goldhagen advocates 'bombing' Iran's nuclear reactors

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

"One of the striking things about anti-Semites is the ease with which they talk about exterminating Jews."

This according to American author Daniel Goldhagen, who responded to The CJN's questions about the latest existential threat to the Jewish people and Israel: the Iranian regime and its President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

In Toronto last month to promote his latest book, Worse Than War: Genocide, Eliminationism, and the Ongoing Assault on Humanity (PublicAffairs Books), Goldhagen said the world needs to brace for the rapid rise of radical Islam spearheaded by Iran, which threatens not just Israel, but democratic states worldwide.

"Very few leaders have uttered genocidal threats publicly, and when they have, they've usually followed through on it," Goldhagen said, noting the very real threat which he believes is presented by Ahmadinejad and by what he calls "political Islam."

Worse Than War is Goldhagen's nearly 700-page treatise on how the world can identify nascent genocidal regimes and prevent would-be, murderous leaders from advancing their agendas.

Justifying the book's title, Goldhagen writes that since the beginning of the 20th century, perpetrators of mass murders have taken the lives of more people than all military conflicts around the world combined.

"War is no longer the means by which most states relate to each other in the world. But we've done nothing to eradicate eliminationism," he said.

In researching the book, Goldhagen – whose father was a Shoah survivor – spent the last few years interviewing perpetrators and victims of some of the world's worst massacres and genocides. The latter term, he insists, has been misappropriated by politicians and lay leaders alike to mean "mass murders of gargantuan size… many hundreds of thousands or millions," while in fact, it should also apply to governments who commit mass murder of "any size."

Goldhagen said he wants the book to be viewed as a "road map" for defining and countering genocide and the eliminationist buildup by regimes to mass murder.

He argues that genocidal actions by countries and their citizens are not simply "one-offs" that happen every so often due to some vague notion of unstoppable human nature, but rather are "systemic problems, with systemic causes" that won't disappear until people begin to prevent them with effective strategies.

One of those calls for world governments to set up a new international institution – and do away with an "illegitimate, ineffectual and corrupt" United Nations, he said – to prevent leaders who purport to commit mass murder by telling them that they will personally pay a price should they embark on any genocidal campaign.

Goldhagen said ideally, all political leaders should be put on notice that "the international community will never stand by if they initiate eliminationist assaults" and that international "policy measures" should be put in place to bring this about.

This would go some ways to forestall any genocide, he said, because these leaders would then know that "acting upon their eliminationist desires will almost certainly lead to their loss of power and imprisonment or death.

"Most of the political leaders opting for mass elimination are in weak and poor countries. If they knew that initiating mass killings… would trigger million-dollar bounties on their heads, backed by the most powerful countries in the world, it would deter all but the most ideologically besotted."

Another of Goldhagen's preventive measure asks the media to change the language it uses to refer to world leaders and people who commit these crimes.

He writes that the media should not use terminology that renders the victims and perpetrators of murder as "abstractions."

Daniel Goldhagen

"We should not use terms such as 'extremists' or 'radicals'… because they automatically and usually wrongly suggest that conventional political means cannot persuade or stop the perpetrators."

Instead, Goldhagen writes that killers should be identified by their general nationalities. Rather than calling them "Hutu extremists," "the SS" or Darfurian "tribesmen," these perpetrators should simply be called German, Hutu or Sudanese killers.

"Terms such as mass murder and genocide should be readily used while eliminationist assaults take place. The usual practice of prefixing 'alleged' before 'mass murder' or 'genocide'… only obfuscates what's clearly happening," he writes.

Worse Than War has also been turned into a TV documentary, which is slated to air in North America on PBS April 7, 2010 at 9 p.m. EST (check local listings).

In it, Goldhagen interviews the subjects for his book, including survivors and perpetrators of massacres in Bosnia, Darfur and Rwanda, as well as the Holocaust.

"My book is a scholarly work, but speaking to people [for the film] who watched their children murdered… I couldn't imagine suffering the way they did. It's disturbing beyond anything," he said.

With regard to today's top world genocidal inciter, Ahmadinejad, and what Goldhagen terms "the most serious security threat to the world," the author believes the international community must start its prevention strategy in earnest.

"[Iran's] drive for nuclear weapons is beholden to a cult of death… to allow such people to have this is folly," he said. "Any right-thinking person understands that there is a non-trivial possibility that Iran would drop a bomb on Israel."

Goldhagen believes there may be no alternative but to attack Iran first and in fact advocates "bombing" its nuclear reactors now.

"It may be that the only way to stop them," he said. "Anyone who looks askance at this possibility should ask themselves what would have happened had Israel not bombed Iraq's [Tammuz1] nuclear facility [in the Israel Defence Force's 1981's Operation Opera]."

However, he concedes that Israel now faces a "terrible choice" on its Iran policy.

"I don't see how any Israeli leader could allow [Iran] to acquire nuclear weapons. But if Israel has to go it alone, there'll be a terrible price to pay. The hypocrisy of the world with regards to Israel is extensive. Even if some countries would be delighted in private [by an Israeli strike on Iran], most would condemn Israel."

Toronto teen to spread peace in torch relay

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Brandon Pludwinski isn't a professional athlete. He's not a millionaire, a movie star or a music sensation. But on Dec. 30, in Powassan, Ont., the 14-year-old will be part of Olympic history.

Pludwinski, a Grade 9 student at William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute in North York, will be one of around 12,000 official torchbearers to carry the Olympic torch through the country.

Pludwinski's role in the Vancouver 2010 Olympic Torch Relay, sponsored by Coca-Cola and RBC, is the result of about 1-1/2 years of work. The teen entered a competition through Coke's website, which included daily questions and an essay contest. He's one of about 4,500 people in Canada who will be representing Coca-Cola in the relay.

"It took, like, a long time," he said of the competition. "I did a lot of work because I like the Olympics and the basic idea of it. I thought being a part of the Olympics in Canada would be a really cool experience."

To win this experience, Pludwinski visited the Coke website to answer questions almost every day, since each answer meant an additional entry. He was chosen to move on to the next round, which included an essay on living a healthy lifestyle and helping his community.

"My essay was about how I stay fit with friends and I bond with them and help do community work," he said.

Several weeks ago, while at school, he finally got a call from Coke.

"My mom had Coca-Cola call the office. I was really excited. I was jumping around, everyone in the office was jumping around. It was a really great feeling," he said.

For Pludwinski's mother, Shelly, her son's role in the Olympics came as a surprise.

"I thought he was crazy. He was driving me crazy… Every day he had to answer a question or write an essay. You don't find a 14-year-old kid that dedicated to his beliefs," she said. "I was so excited for him, because you've been hearing about it for a year."

Pludwinski will be carrying the torch through Powassan, Ont., a small town near Nipissing, Ont.

Brandon Pludwinski, 14, will take the Olympic torch through Powassan, Ont.

To the 14-year-old, the torch is more than just a flame. It's a symbol.

"The torch [means] peace and happiness," he said. "I'm really excited to get the experience to be part of it… I like spreading the message of peace."

Pludwinski isn't just a fan of the Olympics, he's also an athlete. The teen has been ski racing for around five years and is a member of the North York Alpine Racing Club.

"I like to hang out with friends I made on the team. I like racing because of the acceleration and the thrill of it," he said, adding that ski racing is his favourite sport to watch.

"I just like skiing and the Olympics. I can't stand watching any other sport."

Apart from skiing, Pludwinski also volunteers with B'nai Brith and at community events. During the Jewish holidays, he helps hand out gift baskets and has also volunteered at various fun fairs in his area.

"I do a lot of charity work. It shows initiative," he said. "It's not asking for anything in return and giving back to the community."

Pludwinski's mother agrees, adding that he's had "a good Jewish upbringing."

"That's very important in our household. To know right from wrong, to give what you can give," she said.

"He represents what the Olympics is all about… good sportsmanship, being the best you can be. He's got a lot of spirit, he can represent his community."

Indonesia bows to pressure, permits Peer to play

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — With all the hoopla surrounding her entry into the Tournament of Champions in Bali, Indonesia, Israeli tennis pro Shahar Peer, ranked 31st in the world, is making more news on the court than off. Peer reeled off impressive straight sets victory in the group stage last week over Slovakia's Magdalena Rybarikova, 6-1, 7-6 (7-4).

Peer, whose appearance in the tournament was made possible only after the Indonesian government relented to pressure from tennis organizers and approved her visa request, was to face 12th-ranked Marion Bartoli.

Bartoli also defeated Rybarikova in straight sets to set up the match against Peer.

Peer was dominant in the first set, breaking Rybarikova's serve twice while converting 74 per cent of her first serves. In the second set, Peer raced out to a 4-1 lead before the 46th-ranked Slovak reeled off four straight games to take a 5-4 advantage. Peer then forced the set to a tiebreaker, during which she never lost control.

Peer's match came after the Israeli star was granted a visa despite vehement opposition.

"The Indonesian government was very kind. I think that any time sports can help in a positive way with politics it's very important, and I'm happy to be a part of it," the Jakarta Post quoted Peer as saying.

"I have big chances. All of us have big chances here," she told the Jewish Chronicle.

Israel Tennis Association Chair Ian Froman told the Chronicle he was relieved "a clash between sport and politics" had been avoided. "Despite strong opposition to the decision, the government didn't want to go head to head with the sport's governing bodies," he said.

Indonesia doesn't have diplomatic ties with Israel.

An Indonesian foreign ministry spokesman said, "We don't have diplomatic ties with Israel, but in certain cases, where we're hosting events that should have Israeli representation, we could grant them an entry visa."

The tournament features the 10 highest-ranked players who have won at least one international event this year and are not participating in the season-ending Sony Ericsson Championships in Qatar, along with two wild cards.

Let them eat doughnuts

NEW TO CANADA
By NINA SHENHAV

I love kids. Well, not love-love. Let's say love-like. Well, maybe like-bear. Well, bear-can stand-ish.

OK, in a nutshell, aside from my own two kids, I can't stand them.

But the problem is my own two kids love other kids.

So, every now and then, I get to have a precious visit from a little nose-leaking new "manager for the day" and his assertive spokesperson.

And while the kids immediately get busy vandalizing my property, the assertive spokeseperson stands at the door and discusses details, firmly, in a manner worthy of a drill sergeant.

Commands such as, "Danny eats only the yolk, so separate it from the eggs. It's extremely important!" or, "Sharon is used to lamb chops with grilled potatoes for dinner, and don't forget the green salad" are not uncommon.

Once the door is closed, and I'm left with only the little visitor, I explain calmly that, at our house, "We eat cereal for dinner, and if I'm in an excellent mood [When? When?!] I'll add some milk."

Which brings me to the three kinds of host parents – and, politically correct or not, allow me to refer only to moms.

• There's the "I was born to love you" mom.

Her son will say: "Mom, Danny wants to teach me some martial arts? Is that OK?"

Mom: "God help us, no! Come, let's all sit on the carpet in a nice circle and discuss the dangers of violence."

Her son will say: "Danny wants to use the scissors. Is that OK?

Mom: "Let's all calm down now! Only I get to use the scissors! We'll practise some arts and crafts. I'll make you little paper dolls, and then we'll all paint them with water colours."

Her daughter will say: "Mom, Sharon wants a sandwich.

Mom: "Why a sandwich? Let's all walk in a straight line to the kitchen and together fix us all a healthy snack before we start making dinner."

Her daughter will say: "Mom, Sharon's missing her mommy."

Mom: "Come, let's all sit together and talk about sadness, anxiety and unfulfilled needs!"

• There's the "Give me a break, will you?" Mom.

Her son will say: "Mom, Danny wants to teach me some martial arts. Is that OK?"

Mom: "As long as there are no blood stains on the carpet."

Her son will say: "Danny wants to use the scissors. Is that OK?"

Mom: "As long as there are no blood stains on the carpet."

• The "I'm a mom, but not only a mom" Mom (rare)

This happy creature hands her kids some wrinkled bills, put on her lipstick and says: "Watch some movies! Order some pizza! I'll be home in three hours. Ta-ta!"

Tips on boosting your immune system

FITNESS CORNER
By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

Flu season is upon us again, and they say this flu season will be like no other we have ever seen before. How do we keep ourselves healthy?

We all now that regular exercise and a healthy diet helps build a healthy body inside and out. But working out when you feel sick or your immune system is compromised in any way isn't healthy for you at all. I thought I'd take this opportunity to give you some helpful hints on how to get your immune system healthy and stay that way this season.

First, we need to understand what our immune system is designed to do: it recognizes foreign organisms in our bodies, such as viruses or bacteria, and then gets rid of them so they don't cause us harm.

There are many ways to get vital nutrients to help boost our immune systems, such as regular intake of vitamin D from the sun or in supplement form; vitamin C, which can be found in foods such as strawberries, kiwi, oranges, grapefruit or pineapple; and vitamin E, which can be found in seeds, vegetable oil or whole grains.

Other immune-boosters include zinc, which is found in beef, dark turkey meat or beans; carotenoids, which can be found in sweet potatoes, carrots, kale or fresh thyme; and bioflavonoids, which are found in citrus fruits, red and blue berries, grapes, onions and garlic. Selenium can be found in cereals, nuts or legumes, and keeping your diet rich in essential fatty acids such as omega-3s in oils or fish, as well as probiotics and oil of oregano, all help your immune system stay strong. These foods help our bodies produce the various cells that help fight off infections. Other ways involve supplementing with echinacea, grape seed extract and ginger, which have has been known to help suppress cold symptoms while boosting the immune system. (Some studies have shown that those immune boosters are ineffective, but most of these studies are based on dried herbs, not fresh ones. Like food, herbs are best and most effective when fresh.)

Jews, Natives and Remembrance Day

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Take up our quarrel with the foe:
To you from failing hands we throw

URBAN WRITER

On Nov. 11, we remember the 1.5 million Canadian men and women who served our country in many wars, including World War I, World War II and the Korean War.

On the 11th day of the 11th month at the 11th hour, we are silent, to memorialize the 100,000 Canadians who died in these wars and those who continue to die in war zones such as Afghanistan.

We focus on the reality that these men, sometimes boys, and women fought valiantly so we could be free people in a democratic country and actualize ourselves the way we see fit. Had they not fought for us, often as volunteers, Canada, and more specifically the Jewish corridor, would be crowded today with ugliness.

On Nov. 11, we remember 4,000 Canadian Jews who enlisted for World War I and the 100 who died. We recall the 84 soldiers who were decorated for bravery.

This date is legislated as a time on our calendar when we stand tall and salute 16,883 Jewish community members who joined the ranks of the army, air force and navy for World War II; and 2,000 more who did the same while hiding their Jewishness, fearing the consequences if captured by the Nazis. When you are silent at 11 a.m., know that 196 Jewish soldiers won military decorations, 500 were buried with Stars of David and many returned home with wounds that lasted forever.

We are Jews and citizens of the world. It therefore behooves us on Nov. 11 to remember our courageous Jewish soldiers and honour our Jewish veterans, some of whom you can visit at the Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre.

And we are Canadians, proud Canadians, and therefore it is incumbent upon us to remember our fellow nationals of all backgrounds who gave us the gift of the freedom to walk, talk and dress the way we want, as Jews, as human beings.

The torch; be yours to hold it high.
If ye break faith with us who die

As Canadians we must make a special effort to remember our brave warriors – Native Canadians, who despite the fact they were not "official" citizens of Canada, and in spite of the belief they could not adapt to the mostly white battalions – volunteered anyway.

Like blacks in the United States (harassed and humiliated by racists and bullies) who joined the American army, so too did our subjugated aboriginal people join the Canadian military. While the Canadian government, the church and RCMP (in concert with the whispering quiet of our own people and others) kidnapped their children and carried them off to residential schools, Native Canadians took the high road.

On Nov. 11 we remember, therefore, with great pride that 3,500 Native Canadians, 35 per cent of the Native population of military age, enlisted with the Canadian Expeditionary Force. We think about the brave Olympic runner Thomas Longboat, an Onondaga Native (http://archives.cbc.ca/sports/athletics/clips/8011), a Native Canadian soldier who was a dispatch runner in France in World War I, and Lt. Cameron Brant, who died leading a charge in the second Battle of Ypres.

On Remembrance Day, we remember the brave, not the wars. We are reminded not to take Canadianism for granted. We embrace all of our soldiers and thank them for our freedom today and guarantee them we will guard it with all our might.

We shall not sleep, though poppies grow
In Flanders Fields. – John McCrae

Israeli makes cancer treatment discovery

By ABIGAIL KLEIN LEICHMAN
Israel21c

TEL AVIV — An Israeli research scientist has accidentally discovered a chemical compound that eradicates cancer cells without harming normal cells in the process.

The substance may prove to be the long sought-after "holy grail" in the wider field of cancer treatment. For now, it shows promise as a specific weapon against breast cancer.

Prof. Malka Cohen-Armon, a biochemist at Tel Aviv University (TAU), said the compound is a component of a family of drugs developed 10 years ago to preserve nerve cells stressed by a stroke or inflammation. But further study showed the drugs were inappropriate for their intended use.

Cohen-Armon and her team of researchers began working with the drugs to study how the compound affected signal transmission within the nucleus of cells. Their goal was to find an application for DNA repair. Its effect on cancer cells was an unexpected, and potentially huge, discovery.

"We found that those drugs somehow turn on a mechanism in cancer cells that causes them to die within 48 to 72 hours without harming normal tissue," said Cohen-Armon, a professor in the Neufeld Cardiac Research Institute of TAU's Sackler School of Medicine. "In fact, the normal cells continue to proliferate even in the presence of the drug."

The News in Brief

Canada

Hate Section Urged

EDMONTON — Canada should add a Criminal Code section for crimes motivated by hate, says the co-chair of the Alberta Hate Crimes Committee. Edmonton police Det. Stephen Camp made the comment last week when his committee released a report that said 228 hate crimes and incidents were reported to Alberta police last year, but only two have been successfully prosecuted in the last two, partly because the Crown is under-prepared to deal with such crimes. The Criminal Code has sections dealing with promoting hatred and genocide, but not crimes motivated by hate, which Camp called "message crimes," the Calgary Herald reported.

Youths Arrested

QUEBEC CITY — Five teens were arrested when police caught them overturning monuments in the Jewish cemetery in Quebec City, as well as an adjacent Catholic one. The youths, aged 14 to 16, are facing charges related to the vandalism of 11 stones in the St. Michel cemetery and four in the Beth Israel one. A witness reported the Nov. 8 incident to police. The youths were questioned and released to their parents.

World

Boycott Rejected

OSLO — The board of trustees of the Norwegian University of Science and Technology decided last week not to start an academic boycott against Israel. The idea came from a letter to the board from 34 professors who said Israeli universities "have played a key role in [Israel's] policy of oppression" and that "Israel goes against all the ideals of open universities and academic freedom." The letter urged a boycott of Israeli educational, research and cultural institutions. Scholars for Peace in the Middle East, a European-based pro-Israel group, circulated a petition slamming plans for a boycott.

Rubashkin Convicted

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. — A jury convicted Sholom Rubashkin, the former owner of an Iowa kosher slaughterhouse, of 86 out of 91 fraud charges. The 12-person jury's Nov. 12 decision in Sioux Falls, S.D. likely means that Rubashkin, 50, will spend the rest of his life in jail. U.S. authorities launched investigations into the Agriprocessors plant in Postville, Iowa, after a May 2008 immigration raid. The jury took four days to deliberate after a month-long trial and convicted him on a range of fraud charges, money laundering and failing to pay suppliers. His lawyers argued he was a poor businessman. The trial was moved out of Iowa after a judge said the juror pool was prejudiced by media coverage.

Survivors Object to B'nai Brith Ad

TORONTO — A full-page newspaper ad placed by B'nai Brith Canada that equated radical Islam with Nazism has raised the ire of Holocaust survivors and a group that promotes Jewish-Muslim ties.

Headlined "The Unholy Alliance," the ad, which ran Nov. 9 in the National Post, noted the anniversary of Kristallnacht, the widespread pogroms in Germany on the night on Nov. 8-9, 1938. It showed a photo of the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem meeting with Adolf Hitler and noted the "common objectives of Nazism and radical Islam: Killing Canadian men and women on the battlefield, incitement of children through schools and media, annihilation of world Jewry, and subjugation of everyone else, [and] world domination."

The ad solicited tax-deductible donations to B'nai Brith.

The topic of open-line radio shows and hundreds of blog postings, the ad irked the group Canadian Jewish Holocaust Survivors. "We survivors have fought everybody that tries to trivialize the Shoah. We get very, very angry when it is done by Jewish leaders. I think that they should know better," co-president Sidney Zoltak told JTA.

Zoltak added: "We can see clearly the danger of extremism in the Muslim world… [but] to compare the situation between now and then is not healthy."

Barbara Landau, co-chair of the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims, questioned the ad's timing, two days before Remembrance Day and ahead of the second annual Weekend of Twinning of Synagogues and Mosques.

B'nai Brith executive vice-president Frank Dimant defended the ad, saying positive reaction to it outweighed the negative by "about 80 to 20. It seems there are a lot of people out there who are waiting for this kind of strong messaging." Dimant said the ad was "intended to wake people up." He alluded to Iran's threats against Israel as a possible "future holocaust unless we stop it."

Community project aimed at working poor

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

An idea that grew out of a four-hour train ride from Ottawa to Toronto has resulted in a two-year pilot project aimed at helping the working poor.

The result of the brainstorming session on the train, by representatives from several communal agencies, is the now one-year-old Jewish Poverty Action Group (JPAG), which offers the working poor support and a hand up.

JPAG is led by Jewish Family & Child and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) Toronto, with the ongoing participation of JVS, the Kehilla Residential Program and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Janis Roth

JIAS Toronto executive director Janis Roth said representatives from the agencies were so charged up after attending the 2005 national conference of Association of Jewish Family and Children's Agencies (AJFCA) that they decided something had to be done for the working poor.

Roth said they concentrated on the working poor because that is the group that is most ignored. "They are not poor enough for financial assistance, but they are not over the poverty line. The low income cutoff for a family of four is $38,000."

The group was inspired by David Bornstein, author of How to Change the World, who spoke at the conference. "He got us thinking about how one person could be responsible for leading change," Roth said. "We thought that if we all pooled our resources together, we could really do something."

She said the group began by looking at what is keeping the working poor in poverty.

"They're not earning enough or they are working in jobs below their expertise, and they are paying too much for housing. Research shows that the average person can pay 32 per cent of their income on housing. People at risk of homelessness pay 50 to 70 per cent of their income on housing, and poor people may be 70 per cent," she said.

"They have to make choices – rent or food – and they go to the food bank like a grocery store."

Social inclusion is also difficult, she added, because people who have to choose between rent and food cannot join communal life. "When looking to help people, we have to address all three pieces."

Roth said JPAG received a grant from the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto to hire co-ordinator Dalia Margalit-Faircloth, who solicited referrals from communal agencies for families who were in a position to make a commitment to the JPAG program and who were receiving subsidies from the community.

"I was looking for people who could jump to the next step with just a little hand up. I wanted them to be motivated to change their lives, not be in a crisis," Roth said.

Margalit-Faircloth began by working with eight families, Roth said, seven of whom had a family member who enrolled in a course.

One woman, a single mother of two who had fled an abusive marriage five years earlier, was earning $8,000 a year, and was living in subsidized housing.

Anniversary antipathies

From the editor's desk...

Last week, Palestinian Authority leader (PA) Mahmoud Abbas organized a rally in Ramallah to commemorate the fifth anniversary of the death of Yasser Arafat. (See photo inset)

Some 100,000 people came. It was a very large gathering. The highly publicized event was covered by a sizable media contingent. It was thus a wonderful opportunity for the constantly remonstrating, constantly carping, constantly dissembling leader to do something he has never done – rise to the occasion.

He could have seized the moment to shore up the earnest but ineffective efforts of the American administration to move the peace process forward, even if only by an inch. He could have found some face-saving, equivocal formula by which to come down from his hypocritical perch regarding total cessation by Israel of building in the West Bank. He could have reinforced in his people's minds with unequivocal words the absolute necessity of some manner of compromise in order to find a way to coexist alongside a Jewish state. He could have shown even a tiny interest in "confidence-building" among the Israeli public by offering the slightest gesture of understanding for Israeli needs and concerns.

But he did none of this.

Instead, he did what he has only ever done since becoming president of the PA. At every turn, at every forum and at every media-crowned event, he has staked out the maximalist position on every bargaining issue between him and the Israelis.

Some observers attribute Abbas' bellicose behaviour to the fact that he must show "the Palestinian street" that he is as tough and uncompromising toward the Israelis as his Hamas rivals are.

Others simply say that this is who the man truly is. He follows the pattern of Palestinian leaders' thinking and behaviour throughout the history of the conflict. Compromise with the Jewish state is simply untenable.

His address to the 100,000-large gathering proves the point yet again. As reported by Abu Khaled Toameh in the Jerusalem Post here are some of the key messages Abbas delivered to his people.

• "We can't return to the negotiations [with Israel] without a full cessation of settlement construction, including Jerusalem and natural growth."

Israel has offered various ways out of this impasse primarily by unilaterally suggesting a building freeze, though not in Jerusalem.

• "We also want an urgent solution to the problem of the refugees."

This is heavily-laced code language for Palestinians and Israelis. It maintains an unrealistic, unattainable expectation for the former while confirming his unwillingness to abide the existence of a Jewish state among the latter.

• Israel is continuing to "steal land, Judaize Jerusalem, dig under the Aqsa Mosque and arrest our youth."

This was a reinforcing reference to the brazen incitement last month that gave rise to the rioting in east Jerusalem and on the Temple Mount. Abbas simply repeats the lies.

• Abbas accused Israel of violating international laws, saying it was acting as a country that is above the law. The international community, he said, must force Israel to stop its transgressions, comply with international laws and end its occupation of Palestinian territories, including Jerusalem.

This was a reference to the Goldstone Report's findings regarding Israel's war in Gaza with Hamas.

• Abbas said that a commission of inquiry was still looking into the causes of Yasser Arafat's "mysterious" death.

In this unsubtle fashion, Abbas was still keeping alive the accusation that Israel poisoned Arafat. He thereby keeps very hot the embers of hatred of the Jewish state among the Palestinians, for whom Arafat was akin to a founding father hero. Abbas actually appointed Arafat's nephew, Nasser Al-Qidwah, to head the commission of inquiry. Even on the same day that Abbas spoke to the throng in Ramallah, Al-Qidwah repeated the claim that his uncle had been poisoned to death. "Israel also took a decision to eliminate him and then carried it out. Arafat died of poison on the way to freedom and independence."

• The highest statement Abbas made about the need for and necessity of peace was that "peace remains our strategic option." Give him credit for this. But it is hardly enthusiastic, let alone an endorsement or an unambiguous call to orient his society toward coexistence.

In attempting to prove his hard-as-Hamas mettle, Abbas is obsessed with showing "the street" that he refuses to succumb to American or Israeli pressure.

It is, however, to the painful detriment of the Palestinian people that Mahmoud Abbas is not as obsessed with actually trying to achieve peace with Israel.

Israeli society yearns for peace. Israeli politicians see this and feel it too, especially in light of so many other pressing regional challenges and threats.

The hour is ready. But Mahmoud Abbas is not. –MBD

Obama's Mideast policy panned by U.S. author

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

David Makovsky is an expert on contemporary politics and diplomacy in the Middle East, but he's not above citing Jewish wisdom literature to substantiate his position on current developments in the region.

Commenting on the skepticism of some American analysts that an Israeli military attack might not succeed in taking out all Iranian nuclear facilities, he quoted Pirkei Avot, Ethics of the Fathers.

"It is not necessary for you to complete the task, but neither is it incumbent upon you to desist from it," he suggested.

Makovsky, co-author with Dennis Ross of Myths, Illusions, and Peace: Finding a New Direction in the Middle East, was in Toronto last week to address the biennial conference of Reform Judaism.

Perhaps his proximity to so many rabbis explains his citation of Jewish sources, but overall, in an interview with The CJN, Makovsky took a more secular approach to current developments, including the Israeli seizure of a cargo ship carrying 500 tons of weapons to Hezbollah.

The armaments were dispatched by Iran to HezboHah to reinforce the Lebanese terrorist group should the Iranian nuclear facilities be attacked, he suggested.

"I think they're trying to create a second strike capability with Hezbollah to deter Israel from attacking. I don't think it will be successful because Israel can't live with a nuclear Iran in the Middle East."

David Makovsky

Makovsky, Ziegler distinguished fellow and director of the Project on the Middle East Peace Process at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, said Iran remains an existential threat to Israel. But he did not foresee an imminent Israeli strike aimed at degrading its nuclear capability.

Israel and the United States are onside when it comes to addressing the Iranian desire for nuclear weapons – for now. The United States appears to be pursuing a three-phase strategy of engagement/negotiations, punitive sanctions and a military option as a last resort, he said.

Writing in Myths, Illusions, and Peace, he and Ross, currently a special adviser for the Persian Gulf and southwest Asia to Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, "called it engagement without illusions." Part of it is to convince Iran to ship 1,200 kilograms of low-grade uranium out of the country for enrichment. That would allow outside powers to ensure the uranium is not enhanced to weapons-grade levels, he said.

Even if Iran was persuaded to agree, "this is not an end to the problem. It's a beginning. It would re-set the clock and give another year for negotiations."

Makovsky acknowledged, however, that Iran appears to be "playing games," "making promises" and "stretching things out."

Despite some experts' views that the United States wouldn't countenance an Israeli strike, "I think there's a high level of appreciation in the West that if phases one and two fail, phase three is inevitable, whether the United States favours it or not."

Turning to the Obama administration's efforts to put pressure on Israel to freeze settlements, Makovsky said the policy has so far been a failure. It "boxed in the Palestinian Authority" to make it a condition for talks, and it pushed Israeli public opinion behind Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and against the United States.

Makovsky said the administration is re-evaluating its Mideast policy, and he expected it to return to a more familiar approach that is less confrontational. "I think at the beginning, the administration put into motion a policy I don't think was well thought out. They used an axe instead of a scalpel" on settlements.

Speaking before Mahmoud Abbas announced he would not contest the upcoming Palestinian elections, Makovsky said all is not gloom and doom. One of the unheard of good news stories is the security co-operation between Israelis and Palestinians in the West Bank and the subsequent drop in the death toll of Israelis.

"The Palestinian street is quiet... checkpoints have been reduced from 45 (in 2007) to 12 or 14," and the International Monetary Fund reports the West Bank economy is growing at a rate of seven per cent per year. Palestinian Prime Minister Salam Fayyad is working to create a culture of accountability and institution building after the Arafat years and, in a bid to undermine Hamas, some 200 radical clergy have been removed from the pulpit of West Bank mosques, he added.

"The real story," Makovsky said, "is the convergence of interests of Israel and the Palestinian Authority to ensure that what happened in Gaza [a Hamas takeover] does not come to a theatre near you."

Chabad honours pioneering rabbi

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

In 1974, when Rabbi Zalman Grossbaum and his wife, Esther, came to Toronto as the city's first Chabad Lubavitch emissaries and likely the first in Ontario – there were only a handful of Chabad families, and there was virtually no outreach work, he recalls.

Rabbi Grossbaum now heads Chabad Lubavitch of Ontario, the umbrella group for more than a dozen congregations and university-based centres, and more than 50 Chabad rabbis, in the GTA alone. Among other Ontario centres are Niagara and London.

On Nov. 30, Rabbi Grossbaum will be honoured at Chabad Lubavitch of Southern Ontario's 31st annual dinner, a little more than a month after his 60th birthday. The $540-a-plate event will be held at Beth Avraham Yosef Congregation of Toronto and will raise funds for an overnight camp, Camp Gan Israel, that Chabad is building on a 200-acre lakefront site in Haliburton that it bought two years ago. The land cost close to $2 million, and almost $3 million more is needed for the camp to become operational.

There are a handful of Chabad overnight camps in the United States, and one in Quebec, the rabbi said. Building has already started on the Haliburton site, and he hopes to have a program "in some shape or form" up and running next summer. It's unlikely the infrastructure for a fully operational camp will be in place by then, he said.

Reflecting back over the past 35 years, Rabbi Grossbaum said in an interview in his Thornhill office that Toronto offered "an incredible opportunity for outreach" when he arrived.

"[That] is basically the Rebbe's vision, that every Jew appreciates the Judaism within him, and it's a question of bringing it to the surface by way of teaching."

The Rebbe – Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, who died in 1994 – launched his worldwide Chabad outreach initiative some 60 years ago, hand-picking his first shluchim (emissaries), said Rabbi Grossbaum.

Rabbi Grossbaum, now a father of 11, was born in Linz, Austria, and lived in a nearby displaced persons camp before emigrating with his family to Newark, N.J., at age three. He obtained smichah at the Chabad yeshiva in Montreal.

His mandate, on arriving here at age 24, was "all-embracing," he said. "Any project, and any Jew that is reached, is your mandate."

Chabad's successful battle to install an electronic sign to display messages including candlelighting times near Chabad's main office, illustrates his point.

"We kept losing at every level," the rabbi recalls. "Finally, I was told, 'This is your last kick at the cat, to come before the regional council of York.'

"I explained to them that the clientele of Chabad is not a specific target group [that] you form a congregation around, but rather everyone in the Jewish community is our clientele."

As well, he added – a smile on his face and a black hat resting upside-down on the side of his desk – an electronic sign would show that, although Chabad promotes traditional values, it's not old-fashioned or "back in the shtetl."

Chabad doesn't strive to make people Lubavitch in their observance, but to make them "more conscious of their Jewishness for themselves and their families," he said.

Every mitzvah – from lighting Shabbat candles to putting on tfillin – brings "that much more holiness" and warmth to the world, he added.

For those who are already observant, the goal is to "enhance" their values. "Everyone has to grow with their Yiddishkeit."

In Toronto, Chabad itself has grown as it identified diverse pockets – geographic and other – within the Jewish community, as areas for outreach, including the Russian Jewish community, the South African Jewish community, teenagers and children (through a summer day camp program, for one).

Also, Rabbi Grossbaum noted, seven years ago his wife launched a "friendship circle" that matches special needs children with teenage mentors.

Rabbi Grossbaum said that even in neighbourhoods with existing synagogues, not all Jews are affiliated with them.

"We know today – kenein 'hora – there's about 200,000 Jews in the GTA," he said, interjecting the Yiddish expression that wards off the evil eye.

"Probably easily half of them are not walking through the doors of any synagogue. We feel that whether we're putting on tfillin or putting a mezuzah on your door, that becomes the venue for waking them up from their slumber to enhance their Judaism in some form. Just yesterday, I went to put up three mezuzahs in somebody's factory in Mississauga. It gave me great pleasure."

As an umbrella organization with an annual budget of "probably over $10 million, collectively with our institutions," Chabad operates somewhat like a franchise, the rabbi explained.

"We launch all the branches, and provide the seed money to get them established. We're responsible for vetting the candidates we feel would be a good match, those that are more inclined for campus work, for community work, for pulpit work."

In 1957, Barry and Philomena Lowes pursued their dream and founded Camp Timberlane, a residential summer camp located on a private lake in Haliburton Ontario. Their vision was to create a camping experience that would build confidence, spirit and leadership. They strived to provide a nurturing environment that would recognize a person's uniqueness and where values would be learned that would benefit them over a lifetime. The tradition continues today and is being carried on for future generations by the present Director and owner Corey Mandell.

After 52 years, Barry and Phil are committed more than ever to their life pursuit of making camping available to the new generations of children. To make this possible, they have created "Share the Magic"; an endowment with the sole objective of introducing new campers to the Timberlane experience.

Sow the wind, reap the whirlwind

Palestinian leaders once again appear to be rebuffing the opportunity for independence that history has lain at their door. They have abjectly refused to sit down at the negotiation table with the Netanyahu government until Israel ceases all building activity on the West Bank, including of course, if not pre-eminently, in and around Jerusalem.

The Palestinian demand is substantively hypocritical and tactically misguided.

Since the very first day he took over the role of president of the Palestinian Authority from Yasser Arafat, Mahmoud Abbas found no difficulty in carrying on peace negotiations with Israel, despite ongoing Israeli building in the West Bank. The future of the West Bank communities and the presence of Jews in the West Bank was and is an issue to be negotiated between the parties. Indeed, Arafat himself "negotiated" – the term is really a misnomer, because subsequent events showed he did not negotiate in good faith – with various Israel leaders even though Jews were constructing homes in the West Bank all the while he sat at the table with Israel. Arafat's "negotiations" broke down over the issue of Jerusalem, not over West Bank construction.

For reasons related more to internal Palestinian politics rather than to bilateral bargaining, Abbas planted himself on an extreme policy limb regarding West Bank construction from which he has not found either the wisdom or the courage to retreat.

But the demand is also a tactical blunder. Quite apart from the merits of the substantive right of Jews, too, to live in the West Bank, how could Israel simply submit to the bullying demand of the Palestinian leader? How could anyone? And yet, the Netanyahu government has offered a freeze of construction – though not a cessation – pending the outcome of negotiations. Nevertheless, Abbas has chosen to pout and, yet again, proclaim his victimhood.

On Sunday, the Palestinian leadership once again showed its propensity for cunning and calamity. PA negotiator Saeb Erekat said that the PA had decided to ask the United Nations Security Council to recognize an independent state of Palestine whose territory would include the West Bank, Gaza Strip and east Jerusalem.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu correctly responded that unilateral steps by the Palestinians would abrogate all existing agreements and would invite unilateral counter-measures by Israel. "There is no substitute for negotiations," he reiterated.

A unilateral declaration of statehood by the PA would undoubtedly play well against Hamas in the game of hard-line-one-upmanship, but it would wreak havoc in international diplomatic arenas. More ominously, it might set in motion an unpredictability of events on the ground that could lead to a new conflagration.

With this latest threat, the Palestinian leaders are sowing the wind, but they may very well reap the whirlwind.

Martin Citrin, outgoing president of the Council of Jewish Federations, said at the North American federation umbrella group's general assembly that federations must deal with changing priorities and challenges by pooling resources, preparing for crises, and reallocating human and financial resources. He also called for more interdependence between U.S. and Canadian federations.

Arming terrorists not conducive to peace

Israeli commandos seized a ship carrying hundreds of tons of weapons from Iran bound for Lebanon's Hezbollah's guerrillas. While the United Nations reviews the flawed Goldstone report dealing with Israel's incursion into Gaza, it remains silent in not condemning Iran for arming a recognized terrorist organization, Hezbollah. One of the most troubling items, as noted in the daily press, is that the ship made a stop at Damietta, Egypt, where it is reported the weapons were loaded. Another terrorist organization, Hamas, receives its arms through tunnels between Egypt and Gaza. The continuous arming of terrorist groups is certainly not conducive to peace in the Middle East and clearly justifies Israel strengthening its defences in order to protect its citizens.

Fair to criticize report but not the man

No matter what one may think of his report, Judge Richard Goldstone is a committed Jew, a Zionist and a judge of impeccable record for fairness. To suggest he may have erred either in accepting the job or in parts of the report is fair comment. To impugn his character is nothing more than the worst form of lashon hara, for not only does it hurt the man and his reputation, it implies that all who might fairly decide to criticize Israel will be subject to the same impugning of character and thus stay silent out of fear, instead of adhering to tzedek tzedek tirdof.

Losing love for Israel

The editor, in the column "More than a cause" ("From the editor's desk," Oct. 22) takes issue with author Jay Michaelson, who is losing his love for Israel. The column has me taking issue with the editor.

In the column, he quotes historian Jonathan Sarna who writes, "American Jews and Israelis can move past this crisis in their relationship and settle in, as partners, for the long haul ahead."

That would be just fine, if both sides did indeed honour their relationship. But what is one to make of Israel's ambassador to the United States, Michael Oren, boycotting the recent J Street conference, when J Street loudly professes its love of Israel? What kind of relationship is it when some Jewish organizations are shunned, because they are Zionists with a viewpoint that is pro-peace? It takes two to tango in a relationship, does it not?

Is it any wonder that those Zionist Jews who actually want what the government of Israel says it wants may be the next Jews to fall out of love as a result of this snub? The editor quotes Rabbi Daniel Gordis, who writes that to handle that exhausting love, "lots of equivocation" is required. Is this code for the sort of deception that consists of saying one thing and doing the other? Or pretending that some things didn't happen when they did? And how does that square with his final rallying cry that "only justice matters… only the Jewish people's survival matters." Doesn't this just add up to the means justifying the ends?

And that, dear editor, is where the love affair starts to fall apart.

Response to 'Grey matter'

This is my response to "Grey matter" by Eleanor Kunigis Moidel (Letters, Nov. 5).

As we "carry grey sacks of grey ashes on our backs, in our psyches," we also are privileged to receive the legacy that Holocaust survivors bring to us. Many teenage survivors emerged from the abyss alone, desperately seeking to begin building new lives.

Others emerged without their spouses and children, and struggled to rebuild their shattered lives.

Some survivors bravely share their life history in classrooms, synagogues, churches and community venues, where they encourage us to fight bigotry and injustice, and to share in tikkun olam. We are obliged and share the responsibility to bear witness to their testimonies.

As we reflect on their lives, many filled with the building blocks of optimism, success and philanthropic spirit, we are encouraged to help build fulfilling lives that, as Kunigis Moidel writes, "must be bright, must be colourful, must be productive."

Perspectives

In a wartime Canadian camp

By HANS REICHENFELD

I arrived in Canada in June 1940 on the good ship Sobieski, bound for Quebec. I was all of 17 years old, one of the 4,000 – out of 27,000 civilian internees – that the British government was deporting.

After being recognized as a "refugee from Nazi oppression," I suddenly had my status changed to "enemy alien" after Winston Churchill decided to "collar the lot." My father, who had been a doctor in Vienna, considered himself fortunate to have escaped Nazi Germany and obtain a job as a caretaker at a refugee club in Edinburgh. He was also interned, but stayed behind on the Isle of Man, which became a massive internment camp.

On the crossing, we civilian internees were separated by barbed wire from German prisoners of war. When they found out that most of the internees on the other side of the wire were Jews, these prisoners went through their repertory of blood-curdling, anti-Semitic songs popular among the followers of the Nazi regime. It should have warned me of the murderous goals of their movement. I laughed them off, being more intent on enjoying my first experience of the Atlantic on board an ocean liner.

After disembarking in Quebec, a short stopover in Trois Rivières and a seemingly endless train journey through dense forest, I was dropped off in the middle of nowhere and taken to a camp that was to be my new home. It was enclosed by two rows of barbed wire fences, and watchtowers manned by Canadian soldiers. I was sent back to England the following year, no longer an enemy alien, and later joined the Royal Air Force. I did not see the site of the camp again until I returned to Canada as a landed immigrant in 1966.

Camp B was not in the middle of nowhere, but a mere 34 kilometres east of Fredericton, N.B. There are no barbed wire fences and no huts now. But the location of the 52 buildings of the prison compound are clearly marked, thanks to the work of local students working under the direction of Ed Caissie, a retired high school teacher. After taking us around the site on well maintained walking trails, Caissie took me and my wife to the village of Minto, where he had developed the New Brunswick Internment Camp Museum.

It took me back to my time as an internee. A double bunk reminded me of how I shared my personal space with Wolfi, another Austrian refugee from Vienna. We had met at Friends School, Great Ayton, a Quaker school in Yorkshire, where we founded a two-member private club. We called it "Mir san mir" Viennese dialect for "Wir sind wir" – we are us.

We shared more than physical space. We held close political views. Communism was not yet a dirty word, and the view that the Communist party represented the most determined opposition to the rising Fascist and Nazi movements was widespread. To some, it also held out the hope for a better and more just world. In the camp, the Austrian Communist party was well represented. It included Jeno Kostmann , the editor of an anti-Nazi paper published in London. He became our guru. He could discuss every subject under the sun from the Marxist perspective. We also had our local hero, Fredl Hreisenau. He was wounded during the Spanish Civil War, fighting against Franco, the Spanish dictator, in the International Brigades.

Other internees did not share our opinions, and there were often fierce arguments between different groups. There was heckling, and on New Year's Eve, a man who attempted to introduce phony levity during a concert in the recreation hut was bombarded with egg shells. But that was the extent of violence among us.

The camp population was quite diverse and resembled the different groups found in the community of many small towns. They each brought into internment memories and skills from their previous lives and occupations. Study courses to complete their high school education were set up for the younger ones by some teachers, musicians started to give concerts, a choir was organized, a pair of twins perfected a contortionist act they had previously performed in a circus, and expert pastry cooks started to bake cakes for a cafe that was opened in the recreation hut.

A group of Orthodox Jews kept very much to themselves and seemed to be content as long as they could keep up the rituals demanded by their religion. This included the demand for a kosher kitchen, which they succeeded in obtaining. Their only contact with our group was through Fredl Hreisenau. Not being Jewish, he took on the role of their Shabbes goy who would light the fires in the stoves of their huts on the Sabbath when they would not do any work.

Ed Caissie showed the layout of the camp on an impressive scale model that Minto Middle School students had constructed. It reminded me of the time I walked around the inner perimeter with Wolfi on New Year's Eve, contemplating our future.We didn't come to any conclusions, and later our paths separated. But the memory of "Mir san mir" stayed with us, though our club never had more than its original two members.

Other than our double bunk and a mannequin dressed as an internee, the museum had no other artifacts from the first period of the camp. The mannequin was wearing a blue jacket with a red circular piece of material on the back and a peaked cap with a red stripe in the middle. I put on the hat, and I was back at camp B!

The author, left, being instructed by Ed Caissie

But there were many artifacts from the second period in the life of the camp. The Minto students became archeologists and excavated the grounds at the campsite to a depth of three feet. They discovered a range of objects that were displayed at the museum in such a way that one could almost feel how the internees had spent their time, using make-shift tools for artistic productions. They included skilful carvings, portraits, and flower and landscape paintings.

I noticed an exhibit containing a swastika armband just like the ones worn by the storm troopers I saw in Vienna in March 1938, when the Nazis took over and Austria became part of Hitler's Third Reich. It made me wonder who these internees were, and I checked it out in Ted Jones' exhaustive two-volume study, Both Sides of the Wire. The internees from the second period were even more diverse than those from my time at the camp. They included German and Italian prisoners of war, German merchant marine sailors, as well as Canadian Nazis or Nazi sympathizers – yes, they did exist!

There were also a number of German and Austrian civilians who had been living in Canada since the '20s and had become successful farmers or were well established in other occupations. They were exposed to the orchestrated propaganda machine emanating from Germany under the Hitler regime, and no doubt some were taken in by it.

But by no means, all of them. They were interned by the Canadian authorities on the same basis as I had been, because of their ethnic background, or simply because of their names. They included outspoken opponents of the Nazi regime. If they were in a mixed camp, which included numbers of Nazis, they were frequently terrorized by the Nazis and had to seek protection by appealing to the Canadian authorities.

Similar problems were encountered by a group of anti-Nazi seamen who were in the crew of a German cargo ship, the MS Weser, which had been captured off the Mexican coast by the Prince Robert, a Canadian armed merchant cruiser.

These requests were not always well received. The Canadian authorities refused to intervene until there was overt violence – which did occur in February 1943, when an attempt was made by a group of internees to have a group of their fellow internees expelled from the camp.

Ted Jones' account of life on both sides of the wire also includes chilling references to the virulent anti-Semitism demonstrated by some internees of the second phase of camp B. They had elected as their spokesman Johannes Brendel, a respected German businessman who immigrated to Canada after World War I. "He was known for his astuteness and fairness in solving the many problems of his fellow inmates," as long as they weren't Jews or political opponents of the Nazis.

When internees from other camps were moved and expected in Camp B, he made his position clear as to who among them would be acceptable. This is what he wrote to the consul general of Switzerland, who was the official responsible for looking after German interests during the war: "According to the Geneva Convention, different nationalities or races shall, as far as possible, not be brought together in the same camp… It ought to be quite clear – after three years of war – that we will not protest against the presence in this camp of, e.g., pro-Axis Canadian citizens of German descent… pro-Axis Hungarians, Finns and others, whose compatriots are fighting shoulder to shoulder with our brothers… But we certainly do most vigorously protest against the presence in this camp of Jews, half-Jews, Marxists, criminals and other questionable individuals… Moreover, if the Canadian government wants to shut up these undesirable elements… it should create a concentration camp… We demand that all the anti-Axis elements… be removed to a concentration camp. This would give us back the feeling of being honourably interned."

The intense hatred of Jews was portrayed even more vividly in an account by Lewis Chase, who had been a member of the veterans guard during both phases of the camp.

"When the German prisoners arrived after the Jewish refugees had left, they demanded that the huts be fumigated; they even tore up the flower beds that the Jews had planted."

Reading these accounts reminded me of the vast system of concentration camps created under the Nazis, and obviously approved of by Johannes Brendel. How would he have fitted in if he had been spending the war years on the other side of the world, "fighting shoulder to shoulder" with his brothers against those "undesirable elements" whose presence he couldn't tolerate in the camp? Being an expert on camps, would he have qualified as a guard? Not content with fumigating their empty huts, could he have participated in eliminating these undesirables in the special shower rooms built for that purpose?

Answers to such questions can never be found in a museum. Nor could they be expected to. The New Brunswick Internment Camp Museum is very successful in demonstrating the daily life of the internees and how they managed to develop their many-sided talents and skills with great ingenuity. They were physically removed from the momentous events that were taking place outside and had to develop an independent lifestyle geared to these circumstances. Just as the group of internees to which I belonged brought old prejudices and attitudes into the camp, the second group did exactly the same thing. We should not expect anything different.

Hans Reichenfeld lives in Ottawa.

Opinions

The pariah who won't go away

As a patsy for the United Nations Human Rights Council (UNHRC), South African judge Richard Goldstone has spearheaded one of the most deplorable indictments of Israel in recent memory. His report on the so-called "Fact Finding Mission on the Gaza Conflict" has been roundly criticized for its omissions, obvious biases, unfounded allegations and legal misinterpretations. By drawing egregious equivalences between the murderous intentions of Hamas and the Israeli Defence Forces' reaction to such provocation, his report exposes itself as a paradigm of moral inversion and perverse distortion.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

The Economist has called it "deeply flawed" and a "thimbleful of poison," while commentator Melanie Phillips has gone so far as to describe it as a "blood libel against Israel."

Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz said that "Goldstone's name will be forever linked in infamy with the most notorious haters of Israel," while Ma'ariv's opinion editor, Ben Dror Yemini, calls the Goldstone Report a "parade of lies" and has accused Goldstone of having "perpetuated a moral crime… not [only] against the State of Israel but against human rights."

Amid a universal firestorm of anger and condemnation, it looked for a while that Goldstone was having second thoughts about the thrust of his report and the way it was being received. In an interview with the Forward newspaper, he insisted that "ours wasn't an investigation, it was a fact-finding mission" and "if this was a court of law, there would have been nothing proven." Later, with the UNHRC's release of its draft resolution on the report, Goldstone complained about the one-sidedness of the motion, which he said "includes only allegations against Israel, [without] a single phrase condemning Hamas as we have done in the report." Big surprise!

Anyone with a shred of insight – and even more particularly someone such as Goldstone, who presumes to embrace his Jewish identity – should have recognized how he had fallen headlong into that snake pit of anti-Zionist prejudice that hides under the banner of the UNHRC. Surely he should have understood the seriousness of his misjudgments and sought a face-saving exit strategy.

But not Goldstone. He's still busily working the media circuits, promoting, through obfuscation and shrewd manipulation (as was evident in his recent debate with Ambassador Dore Gold at Brandeis University), what he perceives as the merits of his report. There he is, bellyaching over the United States' "lukewarm" response to him, and there he is, ludicrously castigating Israel for not wanting to have anything to do with him.

It's beyond comprehension that he remains out there, defending the indefensible, and seeming forever to wallow in the glow of his treachery and ostracism.

Why Israelis are incorrigible travellers

A couple of months ago a friend, another ex-Torontonian, suggested we take a trip to Laos and Cambodia, corners of the world neither of us had visited. It would be a once-in-a-lifetime experience, reminiscent of a teenage summer vacation we spent together in the late 70s, when we travelled to Israel and parts of Europe.

Yair Lapsteen in Jerusalem

After much vacillation, I agreed. It would be a break from the day-to-day routine, an escapade for two fiftyish men looking to do something different. Our wives agreed, we borrowed backpacks, took shots and began our journey by flying to Bangkok, a gateway for Israelis to the Far East. For about two weeks, we traversed parts of Laos and Cambodia by plane, bus, boat, car, motorbike and tuk-tuk.

The experience was marvellous. It's a part of the world unlike anything in the West. The landscape is different. We repeatedly exclaimed that the sights we saw were straight out of National Geographic – the ever-present Mekong River, rice paddies and their farmers, high rounded mountains, orange-clad Buddhist monks, colourful marketplaces, water buffalo and elephants, traffic, poverty juxtaposed with opulent temples, friendly, smiling people sincerely welcoming foreigners, and remnants of French colonial architecture. Both countries still bear the scars of France's – and more profoundly America's – meddling. We learned their histories, some terribly sad, especially Cambodia's self-inflicted holocaust of the '70s.

Returning to Israel, we felt we'd undertaken an exceptional voyage, experienced amazing sights and met extraordinary people.

This sort of trip is an Israeli phenomenon. We're incorrigible travellers. Every summer, there's a veritable exodus of families to places near and far. Many choose cheaper, closer destinations, such as Turkey, Greece and Cyprus, but others prefer – and can afford – places further away, in Europe, Asia or the Americas.

More exotic travel is almost exclusively the domain of 20-somethings upon completing their army service. It's become a rite of passage. They go off on extended backpacking trips to every conceivable place, with South America, Africa and the Far East the preferred destinations, but not the only ones.

Whole industries have sprouted around these tiyulim. Stores specializing in equipment for every destination also hold lectures for potential trekkers. Hebrew guidebooks are published for every locale. Hundreds of websites provide tips about all possible backwaters. Doctors specializing in travel medicine prescribe appropriate shots to take before travel and the pills to use in case of illness. They advise travellers where it is and isn't safe to drink tap water or eat local fruits and vegetables.

We've all heard about wonderful Chabad Houses in many of the places that young Israeli tourists frequent, providing kosher meals and more to those in need. Local businesspeople also understand the potential of Israeli tourism. It's not uncommon to find Hebrew guidebooks in museums around the world or to see signs in Hebrew inviting Israelis to spend the night at a particular hotel or guesthouse. While in Bangkok, we were astonished to find travel agents and restaurants catering specifically to Israelis. There's nothing quite like humus, falafel or schnitzel prepared by a Thai chef.

So what is it about Israelis that gets us racing to Ben-Gurion Airport any chance we get? Young people just out of the army need time to decompress after their military service and before starting university or joining the work force. They deserve a break.

As for the rest of us, it's probably something to do with the physical size of Israel and a need to ventilate. It's not easy living in a country with high levels of economic, political and security-related intensity. We're constantly in the midst of one crisis or another. Or maybe it's because we can't just get into our cars and drive to neighbouring countries like North Americans and Europeans. Our neighbours are much less inviting.

And when we're away, we understand that Israel does some things better.

In Cambodia we sensed Cambodians have yet to come to terms with the malevolence of Pol Pot and his Khmer Rouge cohorts, who were responsible for the deaths of two million of their own countrymen. Phnom Penh's genocide museum and the killing fields could really use some help from Yad Vashem to make them much more respectable places of remembrance.

More than anything, these trips are tremendously enriching and give one an appetite to start planning again.

From Dreyfus to Goldstone

The 1895 prosecution and conviction of Alfred Dreyfus, a Jewish officer in the French army, under fabricated charges of treason was a decisive event. It was the product of anti-Semitism – fuelled by the Catholic Church and compounded by political manipulation and media hysteria – and it took 11 years before the truth was finally revealed and Dreyfus was exonerated.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

More than a century later, a similar process is taking place in indicting not an individual Jew, but the entire Jewish nation on false charges of "war crimes," deliberate killing and disproportionate force. Now as then, the combination of anti-Semitism (thinly disguised as anti-Zionism) and religion – in this case, one that uses the language of human rights to promote its power and anti-democracy dogma – play a major role.

The core document is a 452-page United Nations "fact-finding report" written under a mandate provided by the UN Human Rights Council (UNHRC), which is dominated by members of the Organization of the Islamic Conference (Libya, Saudi Arabia, Iran, Sudan, Egypt, etc.) Like the military court that tried and sentenced Dreyfus, UNHRC officials appointed judge Richard Goldstone and others to this "inquiry mission" knowing that they were convinced of Israel's guilt from the beginning and would produce a guilty verdict.

Goldstone picked 36 incidents (out of hundreds), and collected and presented evidence that justified their conclusions, under the facade of a fair and professional judicial process. Most of Goldstone's evidence repeats the claims and publications of more than 50 so-called civil society organizations that claim to promote human rights, but, as a careful look at their activities demonstrates, most of their work is ideologically determined.

Goldstone is a high priest in this religion, with close ties to Human Rights Watch – whose officials have a documented history of sharp anti-Israel bias and false allegations. Following HRW and the other groups, the Goldstone report repeatedly and falsely charges Israel with war crimes. By any logical definition of proportionality, after 8,000 rocket attacks, on which Goldstone and his colleagues remained silent, Israel had the moral right to flatten all of Gaza.

Goldstone's indictment, like the Dreyfus case, began with the premise of guilt, and featured a facade of technical evidence that would seem, for those who do not examine the details (particularly journalists), to seal the indictment. In late-19th-century France, police and military "researchers" produced handwriting samples that did not match those of Dreyfus, while absurdly claiming that this mismatch "proved" how clever he was in hiding his identity. In the case framing Israel, the technical evidence consists of repeating the white phosphorus accusations made by HRW's former "senior military analyst" (and Nazi memorabilia fetishist), as well as pieces of ammunition that Goldstone, with no military experience, claims to have identified in the walls of a mosque months after the fighting ended.

In Dreyfus-type situations, prosecutors quickly bury any exculpatory evidence that would raise questions. For Goldstone, this meant erasing and ignoring numerous publically available videos showing extensive use of human shields. By relying exclusively on "Palestinian testimony," supervised closely by Hamas, the fact that more than one million Gazans were used as human shields remained a dirty (but not little) secret.

Now, as in France during the Dreyfus hysteria, justice will only be possible when there's enough outrage to force a reversal of this false indictment against Israel for defending itself against terrorism. This will take time – the anti-Israel hysteria and double standards, like the anti-Semitism then, is too deeply rooted and institutionalized to be readily exposed.

And while some serious people, including non-Jews and non-Israelis such as Richard Kemp (who was the commander of British forces in Afghanistan) have clearly refuted Goldstone's accusations, these arguments need to be repeated widely and consistently. It may take years until a modern Emile Zola emerges to articulate and denounce this immoral farce and its perpetrators.

The Kirshner File

A reporter's reporter

Toward the close of Ari Folman's acclaimed animated film, Waltz with Bashir, a contender for an Academy Award as the best foreign movie of 2008, a fearless Israeli broadcast journalist, his camera crew in tow, strides down a dark street in West Beirut in September 1982, dodging whizzing bullets and hissing RPG's (rocket-propelled grenades) as they shatter walls. In the final scenes, the reporter recalls the events that culminated in the massacre of Palestinian civilians in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps, the telephone conversation he had with Ariel Sharon, the then-Israeli defence minister, and the tableau of death and destruction he personally witnessed at the two camps.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The intrepid correspondent in Waltz with Bashir was not a figment of Folman's imagination, but the real-life figure of Ron Ben-Yishai, a reporter's reporter and one of Israel's most celebrated journalists.

Now a hale and hearty man of 66 who has no plans whatsoever to retire, Ben-Yishai covered Israel's invasion of Lebanon for the Israel Broadcasting Authority, and was the first reporter to enter the Shatila camp, which adjoins the Sabra camp.

Twenty-seven years on, after a tumultuous career chronicling ethnic and religious conflicts from Afghanistan to Kosovo, he works for Yediot Achronot, the mass-circulation Tel Aviv daily, and its sister website, Y Net, as a defence and security commentator. He was in Toronto recently to answer questions about Waltz with Bashir at the Israel Film Festival.

Formerly a field officer in the Israeli reserves, and a veteran of the Six Day War, he was initially reluctant to take part in Folman's project because reporters who interviewed him after Sabra and Shatila distorted his comments.

"I knew Folman, but I was suspicious about his motives. I didn't want to open a Pandora's Box, but he nagged me and I agreed to cooperate."

Ben-Yishai was impressed with Waltz with Bashir, calling it a hybrid that fuses the credibility of a documentary with the emotional resonance of a feature film, and adding that he was accurately portrayed in it. "I never looked sideways. I was interested in what was happening on the ground. The shortest way between two points is a straight line. There was something to cover. An Israeli tank had been hit by an RPG. I didn't have time to be scared. I was too busy working, and that's about it. The same thing happened to me in Afghanistan. After I got back home, I got cold feet."

An Israeli colonel tipped him off that the Phalange – a Lebanese Christian militia allied with Israel – had committed atrocities in Sabra and Shatila, while an Israeli regiment commander corroborated the information.

In Sabra and Shatila, the human carnage reminded him of an iconic photograph of the Warsaw Ghetto and outraged him sufficiently enough to call Sharon at his ranch in southern Israel with the first explicit account of the internationally condemned slaughter. "Sharon had already heard about it, but he was not too interested and didn't ask too many questions."

Ben-Yishai was not surprised by the Phalange's murder of Palestinian civilians. "I expected this of the Phalange. I know the Lebanese scene. A man who looks like a French intellectual is a brutal beast a minute later."

He supported Israel's decision to invade Lebanon, saying that PLO rocket barrages had to be stopped once and for all. "But I didn't think we should have gone as far as Beirut, or try to change the regime in Lebanon. It was not necessary."

Of the opinion that Israel had no alternative but to align itself with the Phalange, he observed, "You don't choose your allies. You strike up alliances with whoever can help you."

An old Lebanese hand, Ben-Yishai believes that Israel won the 2006 war in Lebanon. "Israel has deterred Hezbollah, which has not fired a single rocket at Israel since the war. But deterrence is a slippery thing. It can erode. There will probably be a second round, but it's difficult to predict under what circumstances the next war will be fought."

He is certain, however, that Israel will be bombarded with many more Hezbollah rockets than in the previous war, though Israeli civilian casualties will be kept to a minimum due to Israel's network of underground shelters. Although he respects Hezbollah's guerrilla warfare tactics, he looks down on its actual fighting abilities. "They avoid confrontation. They simply disappear. Today, Israel is better prepared to fight an irregular war with Hezbollah. The biggest problem is that Hezbollah fights from within a civilian population." Ben-Yishai, who was on hand to cover Israel's invasion of the Gaza Strip last January, predicts that Israel will deploy more drones in a future war and thus minimize Arab civilian casualties.

In his view, Israel should have co-operated with a United Nations commission, headed by Richard Goldstone, which accused Israel and Hamas of war crimes. Absent Israeli input, he said, Goldstone had to take Hamas claims at face value. And now, in its own interest, Israel should launch an impartial investigation of the Gaza war.

Turning to another current issue, Ben-Yishai said that if Israel does not separate from the Palestinians by means of a withdrawal from most of the West Bank, its continued existence as a Jewish state will be jeopardized. "We face tactical questions: Where will final borders be drawn and where will the refugees go?"

He doubts whether Israel and the Palestinian Authority can reach an agreement. "I don't see one on the horizon, unless the United States imposes a solution."

Ron Ben-Yishai

He does not think that Israel should consider bombing Iran's nuclear sites unless its budding nuclearization program can effectively be delayed by at least five years. "If we can't achieve this goal, we shouldn't do it. The consequences would be heavy."

Ben-Yishai is skeptical that Israel will ever undertake such a mission, and he can envisage a scenario whereby Tehran acquires a nuclear arsenal and Israel and Iran engage in a process of mutual deterrence.

"The problem is not really Iran," he mused, explaining that Iran's nuclear ambitions could well encourage Arab countries to acquire atomic bombs as well.

Ben-Yishai's sober and pragmatic perspective has been formed on the anvil of war.

Born in Jerusalem, and a graduate of Haifa's Reali school, he served in a paratroop brigade and finished several officers' courses.

A graduate of the Hebrew University, he launched his career in 1966 as a junior economics reporter for the radio station Kol Israel, a position he held until the Six Day War. During the following War of Attrition, he was its military reporter. While covering an Israeli raid into Jordan, he was wounded, not the last time he would be injured in the line of duty.

After joining the Israel Broadcast Authority in 1969, he sustained light wounds covering an Israeli raid on the Golan Heights. Three decades later, in Kosovo, he was wounded yet again. After covering the Yom Kippur War, he wrote about the Camp David summit and Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon.

Starting in 1989, he wrote about the war in Afghanistan for Time magazine, which employed him from 1986 to 1996. In retrospect, the Afghanistan story was his hardest physically. "I lived with the mujahedin for a month and went to war with them," said Ben-Yishai, who disguised himself as a European. Since then, he has covered wars in Iraq, Nagorno-Karabakh, Chechnya and Colombia, and has travelled to Syria, but under which passport he will not say.

Ben-Yishai, who prefers broadcast to print journalism, seems to have only one professional regret. In 2004, he accepted a job as spokesperson for Moshe Katsav, the Israeli president who was forced to resign following a sex scandal. "I took the position out of curiosity, but it was a big mistake," he said. "I didn't like the job or the man."

JNF blue boxes help turn Israel green

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Jewish National Fund (JNF) may be crafting an image for itself as an environmentally friendly organization pushing everything from solar power to river clean-ups, but there's no danger its longstanding blue box will be coloured green any time soon.

The blue box has been employed for generations to link Jews around the world with Israel, "so we're not going to change its colour to green," said JNF world chairman Efi Stenzler. Stenzler, who spoke to The CJN by telephone from Israel, will be in Toronto on Nov. 29 for the annual Negev Dinner.

Although the "green box" was primarily a tongue-in-cheek suggestion by The CJN, the greening of the JNF is no joke.

The 108-year-old organization admits to a "new focus" on environmentally friendly projects. With one million dunams (247,000 acres) of land under its control, "the JNF is the world's biggest Zionist organization. We are also one of the biggest environmental organizations," Stenzler said. "We are responsible in Israel for the forests, with 240 million trees planted in more than 1,000 forests and parks. As a volunteer non-governmental organization, we built more than 200 reservoirs and almost 40 per cent of the water to the reservoirs is recycled water and those waters go to agriculture.

"So Israel today is much greener, even though we have little rainfall."

Recognizing Israel as an arid land, the JNF employs the latest technology to keep the country green, Stenzler explained. "We know how to plant trees in the desert south of Be'er Sheva, which receives less than 100 millimetres of rain per year. The Yatir Forest in the south was planted years ago on 50,000 dunams. This place is the biggest forest in Israel planted by man."

Research conducted in co-operation with the Weizmann Institute has shown that Yatir soaks up as much carbon as forests in heavy rainfall areas, such as Europe.

"Green is not only very nice, green is also medicine for global warming," stated Stenzler, the former mayor of Givatayim, adjacent to Tel Aviv.

The JNF, known in Hebrew as Keren Kayemet Le'Israel, operates research stations across the country geared at improving crop yields. Israeli expertise has proven remarkably effective, he said. So far, one dunam has been shown to yield almost 20 tonnes of peppers. "Today, from one dunam of agriculture in Israel, we get 30 times more yield than the average dunam in the world."

As a result of green innovations, "most of Israel's agricultural exports comes from the Negev Desert," which represents 60 per cent of the land of Israel but is home to only eight per cent of its population.

Jewish National Fund world chairman Efi Stenzler is joined by children from Nitzan to pick up refuse. Altogether 180,000 volunteers removed 1,800 tons of garbage across Israel last week. The JNF organized the ninth annual event to mark International Cleanup Day.

Other JNF green initiatives include creating 100 kilometres of bicycle paths; laying out the infrastructure for new communities; sponsoring Israel's participation in an international clean-up day, educating young people on the environment; cleaning up the Jordan, Yarkon, Kishon, Alexander and Lachish rivers; recycling waste water from cities and re-using it in agriculture, and sponsoring a 50-kilowatt solar power project.

In keeping with David Ben-Gurion's view that the future of Israel lay in the Negev, the JNF has recently agreed to trade 50,000 dunams of land it controls in heavily populated central Israel for 60,000 dunams of undeveloped government land in the Negev, "so we will be able to continue the Zionist project," Stenzler said.

The JNF is involved in a massive water, environment and economic development project aimed at transforming the city's riverfront into a 1,700-acre "civic paradise." Part of the project is the Beit Eshel Historical Site restoration, named after a Jewish community that was destroyed by Egypt during Israel's 1948 War of Independence.

The restoration was the fundraising goal of Toronto's 2006 Toronto Negev Dinner. When completed, the Be'er Sheva River Park will be the largest environmental project in Israel, Stenzler said.

Jerusalem must stay united, mayor says

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Jerusalem's Jewish population has shrunk from 70 per cent to 65 per cent over the past 15 years, and the city will lose its Jewish majority by 2035 if the trend continues, according to the city's mayor, Nir Barkat.

Its Arab residents should be treated "as the Bible says – honestly and fairly," but Jerusalem must remain "the united eternal capital of the Jewish people," the high tech entrepreneur-turned-politician said last week, adding that "there's not one city in the world that works split."

Barkat, who was elected mayor in November 2008, spoke to some 400 people at a Jerusalem Foundation of Canada gala dinner Nov. 8 at Toronto's Four Seasons Hotel, where he was introduced by Israel's consul general to Toronto and Western Canada, Amir Gissin.

The event was hosted by Leslie Roberts of Global News and honoured five "modern builders of Jerusalem:" the Azrieli Foundation, the Asper family, Leslie and Anna Dan, Henry and Julia Koschitzky, and Isadore and Rosalie Sharp.

Julia Koschitzky, president of the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada, said the honorees "have transformed their love for Jerusalem into tangible terms." Among other projects, she referred to "efforts to preserve Jerusalem's 3,000-year-old history."

As well, attendees were treated to a musical performance by four youngsters studying at the Jerusalem Conservatory Hassadna under a program for children at risk sponsored by the Jerusalem Foundation.

Jerusalem faces "tremendous" challenges including the need to find a common denominator among Jerusalemites, and creating more space for business and tourism while preserving old buildings and creating affordable housing at the same time, Barkat said.

"We have to return Jerusalem to the role it played 2,000 or 3,000 years ago, as the centre of the world, a place where Jews and non-Jews alike used to come and practise their faith, worship God, spiritualize, and go back home as ambassadors of peace."

Barkat said that last year, Jerusalem had a net negative migration of 6,000 Jewish citizens.

The reason, he explained, is the economy – specifically, the city's average income relative to the rest of the country.

In west Jerusalem, the average income among Jews is about $16,000 a year, but in the centre of Israel, it's about $24,000, said Barkat, who also visited Montreal last week.

Among the Arab population, the average income is $4,000 a year in Jerusalem, but in the West Bank, it's about $800.

Barkat said he is "deeply committed to understanding and proposing solutions [for] how to turn this around."

Barkat also noted that Jerusalem had just over two million tourists in 2008, while New York, Paris, Rome and London had "at least 40 to 50 million" each.

The challenge, Barkat said, is to increase the numbers of tourists and pilgrims travelling to Jerusalem, and also to enrich their experience there.

Cultural institutions are geared to locals, he said. "We're working very hard to help [them] think globally."

His goal, a decade from now, is to attract 10 million tourists a year. "We need to work very aggressively."

He lauded the Jerusalem Foundation as "a strategic partner" in investments.

The city has a lot to offer, Barkat said, citing "top-notch new ideas" in life sciences and biotechnology. He added that steps are already being taken to create jobs and affordable housing, and empower youth.

Lewis Mitz, vice-president of the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada, announced that, among its other projects, the organization will be working on empowering youth through a sports program in Jerusalem for 18- to 28-year-olds.

Abbas no better than Arafat on peace

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' announcement on Nov. 5 that he planned to resign his post and wouldn't stand for re-election next January received heavy media coverage. Much of it followed a standard refrain: in the absence of Abbas, the strong Palestinian proponent of a two-state solution, the peace process has been dealt a severe, possibly an irreversible, blow.

The Nov. 5 Economist ("Is Israel too strong for Obama?") argued that U.S. President Barack Obama's recent call for Israeli "restraint" on settlement activity in place of his previous call for a total halt boxed Abbas into a corner with his own people. After all, Abbas had made this halt a precondition for the resumption of negotiations with Israel, even though no such precondition had existed in prior Palestinian-Israeli talks, including the 2008 Annapolis talks between Abbas and former Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert.

As the Economist put it: "Mr Abbas, it seems, has been forced to acknowledge that his authority – and his ability to grapple with the Israelis in negotiations if they had resumed – has been eviscerated."

The underlying assumption of this statement and similar analyses is that were it not for Israeli settlement activity (even "restrained" activity), Abbas would have been able to keep his head high and return to the negotiating table in pursuit of a genuine two-state deal.

The problem with this picture, however, is that it's based on a mythology about Abbas' own commitment and record.

A correction to this picture came not long ago from an unlikely source – from Robert Malley and Hussein Agha, who rose to prominence several years back while defending Abbas' predecessor, Yasser Arafat, against the charge that at the Camp David/Taba talks (in 2000-2001), he refused to accept a U.S.-backed Israeli offer for a viable Palestinian state. Yet in "Obama and the Middle East" (New York Review of Books, June 11, 2009), Malley and Agha reflected on the Annapolis conference and acknowledged that "[a]fter months of talks [with Olmert], Abbas declined a far more concessive Israeli proposal—on the size of the territory for Palestinians, for example—than the one Yasser Arafat turned down eight years ago and for which the then-Palestinian leader was excoriated as an implacable enemy of peace. There is little reason to believe that more tweaking of the accord would have made a difference."

As with Arafat at Camp David, so with Abbas during the Annapolis talks: Israeli settlements (however complicating a factor one wishes to argue they are) did not cause the talks to fail. In fact, they were – and remain – a resolvable issue. In both instances, the talks failed because Arafat and the more "moderate" Abbas couldn't bring themselves to accept Israel as a Jewish state.

The Economist itself apparently has forgotten what it recognized merely 15 months ago when it wrote: "Yasser Arafat, the Palestinian leader, infuriated Bill Clinton (then America's president) and Israeli negotiators by repeatedly denying there ever was a Jewish temple on the [Temple Mount] and rejecting proposals to share sovereignty over it."

According to several Israeli analysts, Abbas' attitude about the Jews' religious and historical attachment to Jerusalem is not much different from what Arafat's was.

Furthermore, Abbas' insistence on the "right of return" of Palestinians to present-day Israel makes the very notion of a "two-state" solution hollow. A genuine two-state settlement means two states for two people – a Palestinian state for the Palestinian people and a Jewish state for the Jewish people. Once again, the Economist should recall what it noted in its April 3, 2008, issue: "It is ironic that the fundamental disagreement between Jews and Palestinians today is not about whether there should be a Palestinian state; most Israeli Jews accepted that long ago. It is about whether there should be a Jewish one."

Journalists who focus only on Israeli settlements as an "obstacle" to peace but who fail or refuse to deal with, among other things, the far deeper issue of the Palestinian rejection of the Jews' right to self-determination in their ancestral homeland will never understand what a resolution of the conflict entails.

Holocaust Education Week

Cotler warns against evils of anti-Semitism, genocide

By MICHAEL ISENBERG
Special to The CJN

We must all be proactive and become leaders in our community to rid the world of such evils as anti-Semitism and genocide, MP Irwin Cotler said in his address at the closing program of Holocaust Education Week on Remembrance Day.

Recalling the horror of the Holocaust, combating the new forms of anti-Semitism and looking at modern genocides should make us want to work to change society, the former justice minister and longtime human rights activist said.

"[Hate and genocide] are things in Jewish history which are too terrible to be believed, but are not too terrible to have happened," he said.

"The Holocaust… was uniquely evil in its genocidal singularity, where biology was inexplicably a death sentence – a war against the Jews… a war in which not all victims were Jews, but all Jews were victims."

Irwin Cotler

Today, he said, the war on the Jewish People has taken a new direction. "Today, the most dangerous form of anti-Semitism is from those who want to make the world free of a Jewish state."

He pointed to parallels between the Holocaust and modern-day genocides.

"As the Supreme Court of Canada has recognized, the Holocaust did not begin in the gas chambers. It began with words. These, as the Court put it, are 'chilling facts of history.' These, as the Court put it, are 'the catastrophic effects of racism,'" he said.

But all genocides start with racism, Cotler said. "They all partake of a generic horror… In Rwanda, in Darfur… it did not occur simply because of the machinery of death, but because of statements, sanctions and incitements to hate and genocide. This is where it all begins.

"And we are witnessing it in our day, as we meet yet another state-sanctioned incitement to hate and genocide… [Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad's Iran."

But while Cotler painted an image of pain and suffering, both today and during the Holocaust, he stressed that thought and discussion are not sufficient. Action is necessary for the prevention of future genocides and hate crimes.

"Words may ease the pain, but they also may dwarf the tragedy. Or they may even not only dwarf the tragedy, but in fact, deny the tragedy," he said.

"And so, on this anniversary of anniversaries, we must ask ourselves: what is it we have learned, but more importantly, what is it we must do?"

We can use our reflections and knowledge of the past as inspiration and motivation to become vocal and active today, Cotler said.

"This genocide [in Rwanda] was preventable… Nobody can say we did not know [what was happening there]… We knew, but we did not act."

This holds true for the Holocaust and all other genocide attempts as well, he said. "All genocides are preventable, but society has chosen to allow them."

Cotler concluded as he began – with a call for action. "It is our responsibility… to give voice to the voiceless to empower the powerless… the treatment of the powerless, the sick, the elderly… that's the test of a true just society."

'Ordinary' people can become murderers: prof

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

On the 71st anniversary of Kristallnacht, the Night of Broken Glass, Prof. David Blumenthal spoke about how ordinary people became perpetrators and bystanders of the Holocaust, while other equally ordinary people became heroes.

Blumenthal, the Jay and Leslie Cohen Professor of Judaic Studies in the department of religion at Emory University in Atlanta and the author of The Banality of Good and Evil: Moral Lessons from the Shoah and Jewish Tradition, spoke at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue on Nov. 9 as part of the 29th Holocaust Education Week.

Throughout his lecture, Blumenthal posited that if people can commit evil deeds just by following orders, those same people can be conditioned to commit good deeds by educating youth about empathy, justice and morality. This approach, he said, may help to prevent future holocausts.

Blumenthal spoke about the Milgram experiment, which was conducted in 1961, just months after the start of the Adolf Eichmann trial to find out if there was credence to the defence that Nazis were simply following orders.

The psychology experiments, conducted by Yale University psychologist Stanley Milgram, measured ordinary people's willingness to obey an authority figure who ordered them to perform tasks that they were uncomfortable with.

The experiment was set up so that the subject was told by a scientist to administer an electric shock to a person – an actor in another room who could be seen through a window – each time a question was answered incorrectly.

The subjects believed that for each wrong answer, the person was receiving actual shocks that increased in voltage.

Although many people indicated their desire to stop the experiment as the actor began to exhibit signs of distress, 65 per cent of the participants kept going until the end, as long as they were encouraged by the scientist to continue.

Milgram concluded that ordinary people can commit terrible deeds that go against fundamental standards of morality because few people can resist authority.

"Morality becomes obedience to authority. That is, that which is good is obedience to authority," Blumenthal said.

"There are many similar experiments, all of which clearly show that in a situation where a legitimate authority figure is present, people will do what the authority figure asks, even if they think it is not right."

He said the results from these experiments can shed light on how ordinary Germans were complicit in the Shoah.

He spoke about the Einsatzgruppen, (mobile killing squads composed primarily of German SS and police personnel) and the astonishing way that they transformed from "normal" members of German society to mass murderers.

> 'Morality becomes obedience to authority. That is, that which is good is obedience to authority'

"German civilians were inserted into a hierarchy in which their authorities taught them that evil was good… Doing good was synonymous with following orders."

But, Blumenthal said, in the same way that people can be conditioned to think that following orders to carry out evil tasks is good, people can also be conditioned by authority figures to behave morally.

He said that when he used to hear from Righteous Gentiles – people recognized as heroes for hiding Jews during the war, or helping them elude capture by the Nazis – say that they were not heroes, that they were just doing what was expected of them, he thought they were just being modest.

"But then I realized that they really meant it. They did not think of themselves as heroes or special people. They thought of themselves as ordinary people" who were acting based on what they were taught by their religious leaders and their parents.

"If we want to prevent another Shoah, we must realize… we are part of an authoritative hierarchy, and as such, it is our obligation to exercise our authority [to promote pro-social skills]."

He said the content of what we teach, as well as the context in which rules and values are taught, is what leads to successful moral education.

Blumenthal suggested that societies set up systems by which authoritative hierarchies can be challenged and criticized, and added that we need to "act, to do something," because the discussions are useless unless they are put into practice.

Kristallnacht, SS St. Louis remembered

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — It was a double-whammy of remembrance in Halifax on Nov. 8 as the horrors of Kristallnacht and the shame of the world's rejection of the SS St. Louis were combined in a ceremony at the Maritime Museum of the Atlantic in Halifax.

The event, which drew an overflow crowd of more than 200 people, concluded a very busy Holocaust Education Week that comprised education workshops for teachers, talks to students and the public by Holocaust survivors, films about refugees trying to escape the atrocities and a talk by the director of Christian Friends of Yad Vashem.

Susanna Kokkonen

The Dignity Day program commemorating Kristallnacht 71 years ago brought together the lieutenant governor of Nova Scotia, Mayann Francis, Nova Scotia Premier Darrell Dexter and other dignitaries to light memorial candles.

Rachel Handlesman of Toronto, a fourth-year sociology student at Dalhousie University and president of the Jewish Students Association of Atlantic Canada, has been a member of the Atlantic Jewish Council's (AJC) Holocaust Education Week committee since her freshman year.

At the Kristallnacht ceremony, she recalled the eternal unhappiness of her grandmother, a Holocaust survivor who lost eight siblings in the war.

"I knew part of her life, but she never really talked about [the Holocaust]," Handlesman said in a later interview. "I really didn't understand what she went through until I heard my father do her eulogy at her funeral."

An extensive exhibit of the SS St. Louis was officially opened soon after the candles were lit. The exhibit, which is expected to run for about a year, was coordinated by the museum and the AJC.

Dan Conlon, the museum's curator of marine heritage, tied Kristallnacht to the voyage of the St. Louis in 1939.

"Kristallnacht caused many families to leave Germany to find safety in late 1938," he said. "That led to the St. Louis taking almost 1,000 passengers on its fated journey to Cuba where, despite all papers being in order, they were turned away. They were denied entry to the United States and, even though a group of Canadians had pleaded for their admission to Canada, anti-Semitism at the highest levels of government again turned them away."

He said more than 25 per cent of the passengers were killed in death camps after being captured when the ship returned to Germany.

"Ignorance and indifference were the causes," he said.

On Oct. 29, at University of King's College in Halifax, Susanna Kokkonen, director of the Christian Friends of Yad Vashem in Jerusalem, explained her group's purpose.

"We educate Christians worldwide on the Holocaust, what happened and why, and what has to be done today to fight anti-Semitism," said the 35-year-old native of Finland, who earned her PhD in Holocaust studies at Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

She said Christian Friends invites Christian pastors and leaders to Yad Vashem for special courses on the Holocaust and anti-Semitism. "We think we know about [the Holocaust], but there are things we don't think about – why it started because of social unrest, how the people of Germany felt they needed a saviour and a scapegoat, and how Hitler made the Jews the scapegoat."

Kokkonen blamed Christian anti-Semitism for making the Holocaust possible, with events such as the Crusades, the Inquisition and the French Revolution all contributing to Christian hate for Jews.

"Today, we need to learn of the Holocaust so we can understand our responsibilities, so we can no longer be bystanders," she said.

She praised "rescuers" who were strong non-Jewish people, making quick decisions, knowing what faced them if they were caught, "but who acted like good human beings."

She quoted a highly-ranked Portuguese official in France who said, when asked why he risked being a rescuer, "If so many Jews could suffer because of one Christian, one Christian can suffer because of so many Jews."

Survivors Philip Riteman and Helena Jockel each spoke to more than 200 in separate talks about their experiences.

Arriving in Berlin for the World Cup finals, Eyal, an Israeli kibbutznik, and Rana, a Palestinian living in Paris, meet accidentally, and what begins as sexual attraction evolves into something deeper. Of course, all this is tested as the second Israeli-Lebanon war breaks out. Celebrated at the Sundance Film Festival, the film's honest performances, intelligent script and youthful energy transcend clichés and reveal two people whose common feelings of rootlessness connect them more closely than the cultural conflicts that divide them.

CBC reporter decries 'new' anti-Semitism

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Two days before Remembrance Day, and on the eve of the anniversary of Kristallnacht, veteran CBC reporter Joe Schlesinger urged Canadians to never forget the lessons of the Holocaust and argued that the uproar over Israel's war in Gaza last winter is an example of the "new" anti-Semitism.

As keynote speaker at the launch of Ottawa's Holocaust Education Week, Schlesinger described the events of his own life, both as a child survivor of the Holocaust whose parents both perished and as a witness to, and reporter of, the atrocities of many wars around the world.

For more than 40 years, Schlesinger's award-winning reports for CBC News brought the world – and many of its horrors – into the living rooms of Canadians. Now officially retired, he still contributes occasional documentaries and reports, and it was obvious from the audience of more than 600 people that his name is still a tremendous draw.

The octogenarian walked onstage with the aid of a cane and preferred to sit during his presentation, yet once he began to speak, his voice filled the huge room, its familiar tones comforting yet authoritative, and the audience listened with rapt attention.

Schlesinger was very clear where he stands on the Israeli-Palestinian question.

"We needn't approve of everything that Israel does, but we must try to understand… to put ourselves in their shoes," he said.

"You and I are not in Israel, having to cope with the fact that we could be killed at any moment and having to deal with people that want to push us into the sea… let's face it – the Palestinians are often their own worst enemies. Not only do they fight amongst themselves, but they often antagonize other Arabs. The Palestinians are certainly not loved by other Arabs."

The Palestinians are supported by other Arabs only against Israel, Schlesinger said.

The world's uproar about the supposedly "disproportionate" response of Israel during last winter's hostilities in Gaza is, according to Schlesinger, an example of the "new" anti-Semitism, which is rampant around the world in institutions such as churches and universities.

"In the end, all the world loves an underdog," he said, and Israel is no longer seen as an underdog. "This is no longer about Gaza, it is about Israel as a Jewish state."

Schlesinger added: "We must never forget how the world stood by as defenceless Jews were slaughtered. For those of us who survived the Holocaust… our most important achievement is that we have multiplied. We have children, grandchildren and even great-grandchildren."

Schlesinger was one of 669 Jewish children saved by Nicholas Winton, a 29-year old London stockbroker who organized eight rescue missions that took children from Prague to the safety of Great Britain. According to Schlesinger, those 669 children have grown to a "community" of 5,000.

"We must never forget the evil that happened, but for our own sakes, for the sake of our children and grandchildren and those after them, we must always remember, as Anne Frank did, that there is goodness in people… we don't all have to love each other, but we can't afford to go on hating each other."

Public singalongs – food for the soul

By LIAT COLLINS
Israel21c

Guest Voice

In Israel, people sing to remember, sing to forget, sing when they're happy and sing when they're sad.

Italians do it operatically. The French do it romantically. And Israelis do it in public. Singing, that is.

Israeli entertainment without what is known as shirah betzibur – public sing-alongs – is like Israeli food without falafel. A sing-along evening is a strange but healthy combination of the schmaltzy, the piquant and a measure of public embarrassment – food for the soul.

Legend has it that the Greeks dance, no matter what. This side of the Mediterranean, we sing. We sing so much, even when we're sad, that a whole genre has developed called shirei piguyim – terror attack songs.

One of the best things about living in Israel is how in-tune it is with the times. You can forget about a "white Christmas," but at Sukkot, Shlomit Bonah Sukkah (Shlomit Builds a Sukkah of Peace) and Gali Atari's Stav Yisraeli (An Israeli Autumn) are high on the Israel Radio playlist.

For the New Year, Yediot Aharonot's entertainment supplement drew up a list it tagged as "The Country's Hit Parade: the top 500 songs of Israeli music." The list held some surprises – the first of which was the choice for the top spot. Whereas I had expected that the genius of Arik Einstein would beat all others – Einstein, celebrating his 70th birthday, is the ultimate timeless Israeli entertainer – it was sometime-rocker Shalom Hanoch who led the list with his mega-hit of the 1980s, Mechakim Lamashiach (Waiting for the Messiah). As the paper summed it up: "Sometimes it all comes together – the words, the music, the composition, a few minutes of inspiration and the perfect song."

The paper attributed the song's success to its continued (or perhaps renewed) relevance: Not only are we still waiting for the Messiah – "Mashiach lo ba, Mashiach gam lo metalfen" (The Messiah doesn't come, neither does he phone), as Hanoch put it – but even a generation born after the double whammy of the First Lebanon War and the Israeli market crash of the early 1980s can still identify with the lyrics.

The Yediot list makes fascinating reading, partly because of its very unpredictability. In an unscientific but fun survey of sabra friends, I found that, without exception, they all expected Einstein to lead the chart and Shlomo Artzi to follow, with something either written by Ehud Manor or sung by Kaveret (a group too good to last) in the third spot.

Instead, Hanoch's raw rock was followed by former Kaveret member Gidi Gov's Shlal Sharav, verbally painting the picture of the end of the great heat wave: "as the sun sets in the blue sea and a silent wind calms face, neck, nostrils and blood." If you've never suffered through an Israeli hamsin (heat wave), or more specifically the swelter of Tel Aviv, you might not appreciate how much there is to sing about when it finally breaks. The combination of Gov's rasping tones, Meir Ariel's lyrics and Yehuda Poliker's music definitely created a hit, although one wonders if the voting wasn't influenced by meteorological conditions and location as much by musical tastes.

Third place went to Yehudit Ravitz's Viduy, a poem by Alexander Penn set to music by Sasha Argov. Not my favourite Ravitz number, it nonetheless has the immortal line: "Haya ra letiferet" (It was wonderfully bad).

It is also wonderfully Israeli to take classic poems and give them a musical life. This summer, for example, singer Etti Ankri is making a comeback and giving Yehuda Halevy's words significant public exposure after almost 1,000 years. It's hard to imagine Israeli music without the touch of the nation's poets, so many that Yediot could probably have drawn up a top-500 list of just those works.

Incidentally, Einstein only finally appeared in the Yediot chart (with Hanoch again) in the No. 4 slot, with a message we might all ponder now and again: "Lama li lakachat lalev?" (Why should I take it to heart?)

Liat Collins is the editor of the international edition of the Jerusalem Post. This article first appeared in the Jerusalem Post.

The Nobel Prize

Now that the brouhaha has subsided over Barack Obama's Nobel Prize, perhaps it's time to pose some pertinent questions: Who was Alfred Nobel? Why did he establish his coveted prize? How many Jews have been honoured?

Bookmarks
Bernard Baskin

Alfred Nobel, who died in 1896, was an immensely wealthy manufacturer of explosives. Born in Sweden, reared in Russia, he was an ingenious inventor, an inveterate traveller and polyglot – fluent in Swedish, Russian, English, French and German.

The foundations of the prize were laid in 1895 when Nobel wrote his last will, leaving much of his wealth for its establishment. Since 1901, the prize has honoured more than 800 men and women for outstanding achievements in physics, chemistry, medicine, literature and for work in peace – without consideration to their race, nationality or place or origin.

The number of Jewish winners has been remarkable. In his recent book Human Accomplishment, the sociologist Charles Murray indicates "that, in the first half of the 20th century, Jews won 14 per cent of the Nobel Prizes awarded in literature, chemistry, physics and medicine. In the second half of the century, the percentage rose to 29 per cent. Thus far, in the 21st century, the percentage has risen to 32 per cent.

Further, Jews have won 51 per cent of the Wolf Prizes (physics), 28 per cent of the Max Planck Medals (theoretical physics), 38 per cent of the Heineman Prizes (mathematical physics) and 53 per cent of the Enrico Fermi Awards (lifetime achievement in energy research).

The prize for literature was defined as "not only belles-lettres, but also other writings which, by virtue of their form and style, possess literary value," Murray writes. At the same time, the restriction to works presented "during the preceding year" was softened: "older works" could be considered."

Four Jews, each writing in a different language, have won prizes in literature. S.Y. Agnon (Hebrew), I.B. Singer (Yiddish), Nelly Sachs (German), and Saul Bellow (English).

Nine Israelis have won prizes including Ada Yonath, who was one of a trio of winners this year in the field of chemistry. Over the years, only 40 women have won the prestigious prizes, including Marie Curie, who accepted the prize for physics in 1903 and for chemistry in 1911.

The following winners have been outspoken in the cause of peace.

• I made one mistake in my life – when I signed that letter to President Roosevelt advocating that atom bombs should be built. But perhaps I can be forgiven for that because we all felt that there was a high probability that the Germans were working on this problem, and they might have success and use the atomic bomb to become the master race. –Albert Einstein

• The opposite of love is not hate; it's indifference. The opposite of faith is not heresy; it's indifference. And the opposite of life is not death; it's indifference. – Elie Wiesel

• I've seen more common sense expressed around the table in a farmhouse than I have around the table in the United Nations Committee Room. – Lester Pearson

Subject to controversy and second-guessing, the Nobel Prize remains a unique goad to universal creativity.

Jewish Life

From plagiarism to Madoff

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Before we rehearse the depressing statistics of how many students now appear to take cheating of one kind or another for granted, and have found a myriad of creative ways to rationalize such practices, let's pay homage to Ben Franklin's contribution to childhood mythology: a penny saved is a penny earned, a stitch in time saves nine, and honesty is the best policy.

This last saying, Franklin cited, seemingly without attribution, from earlier writers, namely Shakespeare and Cervantes. The Bard's version, "Honesty is the best policy, if I lose mine honour, I lose myself," directly links truth-telling to personal salvation. If lying and cheating means the vanishing of one's spiritual integrity, then current education must reckon with all of the soulless ghosts racing through our hallways.

Not that they don't have perfect role models in grown men and women. The egalitarian nature of dishonesty is where democracy really gets to strut its stuff. Everyone is in on the act. Men, women, black, white, Hispanic, Asian, young, old, rich, poor – nobody wants to miss out.

We live in what David Callahan calls "the cheating culture." Athletes take steroids. CEO's pad their golden parachutes. Politicians cozy up to lobbyists. Adultery is a national sport. Best-selling writers make up their supposedly "true" stories. And even South Korean stem-cell scientist, Hwang Woo Suk, confessed that he faked his data.

Is it any wonder that some of my students consider substituting someone else's essay as their own to be a minuscule infraction of an increasingly non-existent code of behaviour?

Why are we surprised or outraged when they cheat?

Don McCabe, founder of Duke University's Center for Academic Integrity, conducted surveys taken by nearly 62,000 undergraduates on 96 American campuses between 2002 and 2006. Two-thirds of the students admitted to cheating at some point, but more striking was how little wrongdoing they ascribed to cheating, if any. Many other polls echo McCabe's findings. Call it the pressure to get ahead, call it a weakening of society's moral fabric, or call it doing what everyone else does, but the internal buzzer that's supposed to alert us to ethical slip-ups has gone mute. And this staggering figure of 67 per cent covers only those who told the truth about cheating.

In the winter of 2009, the question of honesty resurfaced with a vengeance in the figure of a gentle-faced man of 70, someone you've seen at a hundred weddings and bar mitzvahs, and in movies in the role of the kindly Jewish grandfather. He seemed like the "candy man," the fellow in shul who gives sweets to delighted children. And who knows – it could be that he actually did dish out a jujube or two. But when it comes to dishonesty ruining lives, no one gets to move to the front of the line ahead of Bernard Lawrence Madoff.

The story is well known – the giant Ponzi scheme, thousands of life savings wiped out, and charities forced to close, with a domino effect being felt by thousands of others. Don't tell me that one man can't change the world.

Liel Leibovitz looks at a new project to offer Arabic and Farsi translations of key Holocaust works. There's an excerpt from Rashi and a short video of author/activist Elie Wiesel. And On the Bookshelf presents an eclectic mix of what's new in the stacks. [tabletmag.com]

The Association of Jewish Libraries has also compiled a similar list of titles for children. But it has gone a step further with its New Jewish Values finder website. This searchable database emphasizes books that promote moral qualities and good deeds. As with most book-related search engines, you can look for titles by author, title or ISBN number. What sets this search engine apart is the ability to also search for books that emphasize values such as social activism, compassion, honouring the aged, and love for Torah. [ajljewishvalues.org]

If you'd like to hear some smart talk about Jewish books, check out The Book of Life: Jewish People and the Books Podcasts. Kvetchfessional! takes a look at Jewish young adult chick lit. Another podcast (also sporting an exclamation mark) – Klezmapalooza! – celebrates klezmer music and includes an interview with Joan Betty Stuchner, author of The Kugel Valley Klezmer Band (sold in Canada as Shira's Hanukkah Gift). [bit.ly/jlib22]

And let's not forget about the mamaloshen. Since Aaron Lansky founded the National Yiddish Book Center in 1980, the centre has recovered 1.5 million volumes. Even if you can't visit the centre's home in Amherst, Mass., you can still benefit from its successes. You can view its catalog online, its list of The 100 Greatest Works of Modern Jewish Literature [bit.ly/jlib23] and read generous, free selections from Pakn Treger, an English language journal about Yiddish culture.

Sholem Aleichem's Honorable Profession: Menakhem-Mendl Becomes a Writer is presented in its original Yiddish, alongside an English translation by Hillel Halkin. [bit.ly/jlib24] And in Ritz with a Shvitz, there's a feature about the historic Libby's Hotels and Baths on New York's Lower East Side and the story of one man's lavish monument to his mother. [bit.ly/jlib25]

And for something completely different, try to figure out what Woody Allen, S.Y. Agnon and Isaac Asimov have in common. Their works all appear on Steven Silver's Jewish Science Fiction and Fantasy reading list. Silver has included almost 500 titles from Jewish and non-Jewish authors, including Isaac Bashevis Singer's (The Golem), Harlan Ellison (I'm Looking for Kadak) and Miriam Baskin (My Clone and I from Jewish Sci-Fi Stories for Children). Do you have a qualm with Steven Silver's choices or do you want to try your hand at the genre? Then you're invited to join the Jewish Speculative Fiction Discussion Group. [bit.ly/jlib26]

Chabad breaks ground for community centre

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — About 70 people gathered Nov. 8 for the official groundbreaking ceremony for the new Jewish learning and community centre that Chabad Lubavitch is building in south Winnipeg.

"Groundbreaking ceremonies have special meaning for us," Rabbi Avrohom Altein, Chabad's spiritual leader in Winnipeg since 1970, told those in attendance.

That's because, as in a groundbreaking, Chabad tries to "dig beneath the surface of people and try to nurture their Yiddishe neshamas," he added.

"Chabad is not about membership and synagogues and schools. We are about enhancing the foundations for Jewish life. When a Jewish person finds meaning or purpose and understands what life is about, he feels more a part of the Jewish community."

Rabbi Altein himself was praised by David Rich, a Winnipeg businessman who is co-chairing the centre's capital campaign with his son, Gavin.

"Rabbi Altein is an incredible individual," Rich said. "He started here… with nothing and created a day camp, a school, a north Winnipeg synagogue and community centre and a south Winnipeg presence. And now, we have this."

Joe Bova, the contractor and native of Italy who is building the new learning centre, noted that he was in Israel last summer with some Jewish friends.

"It was while visiting Masada that I came to realize how important this centre is," Bova said. "I had been trying to tell Rabbi Altein that the project was over budget and that we had to cut costs. I was trying to persuade him to take out the mikvah, for example, and the daycare. On my return, we put everything back in."

Also speaking at the event were Conservative MP Rod Bruinooge, representing the federal government, as well as MLA Kerri Irvin-Ross, Manitoba's minister for healthy living, representing the province, and the area's city councillor, John Orlikow.

The two senior levels of government helped jump-start construction of the centre with two separate $320,000 grants – one of which was part of the federal stimulus program – which were announced in mid-September. The Chabad fundraising campaign also received a donation of $75,000 from the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba.

About 10 years ago, with the majority of Winnipeg's Jewish population having shifted from north to south Winnipeg, Chabad opened a south Winnipeg branch in a small, rented storefront space. Chabad bought the land for a larger centre in the largely Jewish and affluent River Heights area four years ago and kicked off a fundraising campaign in May 2007 with a dinner honouring the Rich family, who are strong supporters of Chabad in Winnipeg. The overall project is expected to cost more than $3 million. The centre is slated to be ready by next fall.

The new building will house a multi-purpose social hall/lecture hall/synagogue, along with classrooms, a library and a small gym for Chabad's preschool program and its summer and winter camp.

The new building will be able to accommodate 350 to 400 people, compared to the 65 to 75 that can be comfortably squeezed into the present rented space.

SOMETHING SWEET FOR SICK KIDS

Zachary Winkler, 8, raised more than $3,300 – almost double the amount he raised last year – for Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children at his third annual "Do Something Sweet" event Nov. 1. Zachary, seen with his sister and helper Maya, 5, handed out candy floss on his Thornhill driveway and asked people to donate what they could. A magician and face painter donated their time to the event, and Yehudale's Pizza, Joe Boo's Cookoos and the Israeli Source sponsored T-shirts that were given to people who donated $20 or more.

Vandals target Calgary and Ontario shuls

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Just days after the 71st anniversary of Kristallnacht – the anti-Jewish riots in Nazi Germany on Nov. 9-10, 1938 – Calgary police were investigating incidents of anti-Semitic vandalism that took place this past Saturday night.

As well, at least two Ontario synagogues, one in Oshawa and one in Barrie, had swastikas spray-painted on them over the weekend.

Len Rudner, Ontario regional director of Canadian Jewish Congress, said the Calgary vandalism was "quite nasty."

According to a Nov. 16 report from radio station 660 News in Calgary, the Calgary Jewish Community Centre's marble Holocaust memorial, as well as a number of synagogues, bus stops and a private home, were among the targets.

The report said investigators were reviewing surveillance tapes of the culprits, but weren't sure they'd be able to identify the offenders from the video. They believe they're looking for two or more suspects. The case is being reviewed by the Calgary police hate crimes unit, the report said.

Rudner learned on Monday morning, shortly before The CJN went to press, that a swastika had been spray-painted on Beth Zion Congregation on King Street East in Oshawa, about 50 kilometres east of Toronto.

A swastika was also discovered Saturday morning on an exterior wall of Am Shalom Synagogue on Huronia Road in Barrie, about an hour north of Toronto. The swastika, painted in black, measured about 10 inches by 10 inches, according to Sgt. Peter Dewsnap of the Barrie Police Service.

Dewsnap told The CJN on Monday morning that police are looking at video surveillance as part of the investigation, and he encouraged the public to come forward with any information.

A media release from Barrie police classified the incident as "mischief," but Dewsnap said that "targeting one specific group" is considered a hate crime.

Rudner said that damage to property is considered "mischief," but that in addition to more blatant hate crimes such as advocating genocide, motivation is a contributing factor to the classification of a crime and can affect the sentence given on conviction.

"From our point of view, clearly a swastika painted on the side of a synagogue suggests a motivation."

To contact Barrie police with information about the incident at Am Shalom, call 705-725-7025.

Y restaurant loses hechsher

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The restaurant at the YM-YWHA remained without kashrut supervision last week after the Vaad Ha'ir removed its MK certification on Nov. 6.

Café Dizengoff in the Y's Ben Weider Jewish Community Centre was closed until the end of last week, when it partially re-opened serving only dairy and pareve foods, said co-owner Yossi Cohen.

Cohen and his business partner Laurence Rubio had counted on obtaining a KSR hechscher from the Sephardi community's Rabbinat sépharade du Québec by last week, but that was ultimately refused, Cohen said.

The Vaad Ha'ir issued an alert Nov. 6 that Café Dizengoff and its kiosk in the Y's atrium were no longer under its supervision, effective immediately.

Vaad director Rabbi Saul Emanuel told The CJN the withdrawal of the hechscher was unrelated to the Y's controversial new policy of opening on Shabbat, which took effect Oct. 31 and which the Vaad strongly disagrees with.

He said the reason was that the restaurant was in arrears for more than a year with the Vaad, having been unable to keep up with payments for a full-time mashgiach.

Rabbi Emanuel said the Vaad had set up a payment plan for the owners to help them eliminate their debt gradually, but they hadn't kept up with their commitment. The Vaad also waived its annual $1,200 licensing fee, he said.

He said the Vaad had been subsidizing the cost of the mashgiach for more than a year and could no longer carry that load.

He added that efforts were made by rabbinical and lay interveners to try to come to some solution, but they were not successful. "The Vaad lost a lot of money," he said. "We tried all avenues.

"We cannot keep funding a business," Rabbi Emanuel said. "The Vaad does not make one penny [from kashrut supervision]. It's a community service."

Cohen and Rubio denied that they weren't making their payments.

They suspect that that the real reason they have lost the MK and failed to obtain the KSR is the rabbinate's opposition to the Y's opening on Shabbat.

TOONIES FOR TOGETHERNESS: Grade 8 students at The Leo Baeck Day School introduced their tzedakah project, "Toonies for Togetherness" at the URJ Biennial, which raises money to help fund a joint Jewish/Arab school which the Reform movement in Israel is running. Each delegate who contributed a toonie was given a triangle to decorate with symbols representing their Jewish identity, which was then mounted as part of a larger Magen David mosaic. To date, students have raised $4,000. From left, back row, Hedy Moses, North Campus art teacher, Massad Markus, Kasey Moss, Kari Steiner, Mike Levinsky, North Campus Middle School coordinator. Front Row, Arielle Rashkovan and Matthew Bogoroch.

Obituary

Beloved former Winnipeg rabbi dies in Florida

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For the second time in less than a month, Winnipeg's Jewish community is remembering a popular and long-serving rabbi.

Where Rabbi Louis Berkal (who died on Oct. 20) was the face of the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue for 50 years, for much of that period, Rabbi Shalom Rappaport was the voice of the Rosh Pina Congregation.

Rabbi Rappaport passed away on Friday, Nov. 6, in Deerfield Park, Fla., where he and his wife, Elaine, had been living for the past 20 years. The funeral was held in Deerfield Park on Sunday, Nov. 8. Rabbi Rappaport was 82.

Shalom Rappaport is being remembered in Winnipeg as the ideal of what a rabbi is supposed to be.

Rabbi Neal Rose, a longtime colleague, described him as a "people person."

"He was a pastoral rabbi who was very dedicated to his calling," Rabbi Rose said. "He was truly concerned about people. He was a good friend to many people."

Rabbi Rose also noted Rabbi Rappaport's wonderful sense of humour and his strong love of tradition.

Cantor Judah Smolack, who worked with Rabbi Rappaport at Rosh Pina for many years, remembered him as a great guy.

"I have worked with a number of rabbis and Shalom was the greatest," Smolack said. "He was very unpretentious. There was never any sense of rivalry or jealously between us. We always worked well together."

Laurie Mainster, a lifelong Rosh Pina member, described Rabbi Rappaport as a "rabbi's rabbi."

"He loved being a rabbi," Mainster recalled. "He was very loyal to his congregation, his synagogue and Israel. He had a terrific sense of humour.

"He was my mentor, my adviser, my confidant and one of my closest friends."

Rabbi Rappaport was a graduate of the Orthodox Mesivta Rabbi Chaim Berlin Yeshiva in New York. He came to Rosh Pina and Winnipeg in 1967 after serving in pulpits in Pennsylvania and San Diego.

"Rabbi Rappaport came to Winnipeg because of the day schools and the community," said Rabbi Henry Balser, a colleague of Rabbi Rappaport's in Winnipeg and later, one of his successors at the Rosh Pina/Congregation Etz Chayim.

"When I first arrived in Winnipeg [as spiritual leader at the Shaarey Zedek] in 1988, he welcomed me and introduced me to the community," Rabbi Balser recalls. "He was a good colleague."

In December 1987, Rosh Pina held a dinner in celebration of Rabbi Rappaport's 21st anniversary at the shul (as well as the synagogue's 36th anniversary at its Matheson Avenue location), at which time the congregation established the Rabbi Rappaport Education and Lecture Series through the Jewish Foundation.

"We bring in a major speaker every other year," said Mainster, who also chaired the 1987 dinner. "The next lecture in 2010 will be a memorial lecture."

Smolack noted that after Rabbi Rappaport retired to Florida, he was asked to become the spiritual leader of a congregation made up of rabbis. He continued in that position until his health began to fail a few months ago.

"The funeral was very well done," said Rabbi Balser, who now leads a congregation in Florida and was able to attend.

Rabbi Rappaport is survived by his wife, Elaine, of 58 years, and by his children, Alan in Winnipeg, Bonny and Danny in Toronto and Eppy in Vancouver, and their families.

Potential applications are enormous

In experiments with female mice, the compound was injected with several types of cancerous tissue, particularly breast-cancer cells. Cohen-Armon was amazed to discover that the substance suspends cell division in both cancerous and normal body cells – but while cancer cells never recover, normal cells are back in business within 12 hours.

"If we had tried to look for some drug that would do this, it would have taken us a lot of time," said Cohen-Armon, whose latest findings appear in the current issue of the international peer-reviewed Journal of Breast Cancer Research.

The potential applications of such a drug are enormous, she said.

Patients diagnosed with the disease must undergo chemotherapy and radiotherapy, both of which are aggressive treatments that kill cancerous and healthy cells, causing severe side effects in the patient. In some cases, patients undergoing chemotherapy can even die from the side effects of the treatment.

"We actually found the Achilles heel of the cancer cell," Cohen-Armon said in an article in the Israeli daily Ha'aretz. "As soon as you can target cancerous cells without killing healthy ones, you can produce medications that would cause a lot less suffering to the patient. We can even give a much more aggressive treatment without worrying about harming healthy tissues."

Malka Cohen-Armon

Cohen-Armon – who is working with veterinarian David Castel, Sheba Cancer Research Center scientist Dr. Shai Izraeli and PhD student Asher Castiel – hopes that in future, the drug could also be used for other types of cancer.

"If we can understand the molecular mechanism well, then perhaps [we can identify] other drugs that could be used even more efficiently and for other cancers," she said. "Then we can give a drug specific to whatever cancer a patient has, and with no side effects."

At present, Cohen-Armon and her team are restricted to exploring the effects of this drug on breast cancer alone, as the drug is patented to a U.S. pharmaceutical company until 2017. The university's technology transfer company, Ramot, has secured a usage patent enabling it to develop the drug to treat only breast cancer, and is reliant on the U.S. company's continuing goodwill.

The team is working with severely limited funds. A major infusion of funds is necessary to bring the potential treatment from lab to market.

"A university cannot develop a drug on its own," Cohen-Armon said. "These experiments, if undertaken by a pharmaceutical company, can be completed in a shorter time because they have more resources. So we must find a company interested in collaborating with us in developing this drug."

Teen chooses charity over bar mitzvah party

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Aaron Serruya won't be having a bar mitzvah party this year. Instead, he'll help feed thousands of Israelis.

Aaron, who turns 13 on Nov. 22, decided to donate about $5,000 to an Israeli charity instead of having a party. The charity, Hazon Yeshaya, runs 60 soup kitchens throughout Israel.

Aaron Serruya, who volunteered at a Hazon Yeshaya soup kitchen in Israel, is given a talit for his efforts by Hazon Yeshaya's founder, Abraham Israel.

"All my friends have a party for their 13th birthday. I wanted to help the poor people and give something to the community," he said. "A party is just one night, a donation is for life."

Aaron's decision came after a trip to Israel in October, where he spent a day working at a Hazon Yeshaya soup kitchen in Jerusalem.

"I thought it was a really good cause. I saw how hungry everyone was," Aaron said.

Instead of a bar mitzvah party, he will hold an information night to promote Hazon Yeshaya at the Sephardic Kehila Centre at 8 p.m on Dec. 5.

Hazon Yeshaya, which was started in 1997 by Abraham Israel, provides more than 400,000 free meals a month, as well as free dental clinics.

Israel will be flying to Toronto to accept the donation at the information night.

"How can I not come down when a person does something like this," he said. "This is unbelievable, to put it in words is very difficult. All I can say is it shows what kind of a heart he has."

While Israel was surprised by the news, he can understand the decision, especially after Aaron's experience at the soup kitchen.

"The reason is very simple. When people see the stretched out hands of people receiving their only meal of the day… and they see the smile on the face of the recipient, you can not buy this anywhere," Israel said, adding that, for many new volunteers, the scene can be a shock.

"I think that people, just like Aaron, for the first time in their lives, are confronted with real poverty," he said. "It's a shock to see these people, the way they are dressed."

Shalom Verrilli, the organization's director of development, agrees.

"If he helped us serve, that would definitely have inspired him," he said. "If you come to visit, you'll see immediately. We serve poor people."

For Verrilli, the donation means more than just money.

"It's quite exceptional… to recognize that here are people suffering in this world," he said. " I think he's going to turn into a remarkable young man. It would be a pleasure to know him."

Aaron's mother, Orna, was surprised by her son's decision. But not shocked.

"He wanted to make a difference in the world… 'I don't want to waste your money on a stupid party.' Those were his words," she said, adding that the family's trip to Israel showed Aaron, whose father, Michael, is the CEO of CoolBrands International, a different side of his culture.

"It made him realize that not everyone's as fortunate as him. He was shocked to see how some people are impoverished… I think Aaron realized it's good to give back when you're able to."

Community has pulled together on project

The JPAG program allowed her to attend school full time while supporting her family. "I am so thankful, and am looking forward to achieving my goals, so I can support myself and my children, and assist other abused women and children who are in need," she wrote in a letter to Margalit-Faircloth.

Another woman wrote that she was an obstetrician from South America and was working in a lab in a downtown hospital. "The JPAG program is helping me further my studies so I can achieve a higher standard of living for my family, and develop my full potential. [The program] let me open my eyes and see that there is a bright future ahead that I can reach."

Roth said that the community has pulled together to help with the project. "Behind Dalia, there is a team of agencies who are working for the success of each person. It's a client-centric approach. The client is at the centre, and the services work around the client. It is the [right] way to treat people.

"There is no need for anyone to be stuck. With an investment and some retraining, they can become self-reliant, instead of depending on the community. Many of these families will give back more than we gave them."

גידי קורן וחברים

החלום של הפיכת השמש הקוסמת למקור אנרגיה נקיה, ירוקה וידידותית לסביבה הוא חלום ישן. רק בשנים האחרונות התחיל העיון של ייצור חשמל מאנרגיית שמש לקרום עור וגידים, ולא צריך להיות נביא כדי לנחש שמספר חברות ישראליות הן מחלוצות הענף, בנסיון להפוך את התחליך הזה ליעיל וריווחי.
